- 24.1 Then the bodhisattva great being Maitreya said to the venerable Subhūti, “Blessed Subhūti, there is a foundation of meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, that bodhisattva great beings have—a foundation of meritorious action that they dedicate to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, making common cause with all beings, without apprehending anything. Then there is a foundation of meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, that all beings have; there is a foundation of meritorious action originating from the generosity of those who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas and of those who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas; and there are also foundations of meritorious action originating from their ethical discipline and meditation. [F.139.a] Among all these, the foundation of meritorious action endowed with rejoicing that bodhisattva great beings dedicate to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, making common cause with all beings, is said to be the best, it is said to be authentic, it is said to be foremost, {Ki.II-III: 123} it is said to be supreme, it is said to be perfect, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, it is said to be the highest. It is said to be unequaled, and it is said to be equal to the unequaled. [B36]
- 24.2 “If you ask why, it is because the foundation of meritorious action originating from the generosity of those who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas and of those who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the foundations of meritorious action originating from their ethical discipline and meditation, are established in order that they themselves might be disciplined, in order that they themselves might be brought to peace, and in order that they themselves might attain final nirvāṇa. Their applications of mindfulness and [other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the six extrasensory powers, are also merely established in order that they themselves might be disciplined, in order that they themselves might be brought to peace, and in order that they themselves might attain final nirvāṇa. On the other hand, bodhisattvas dedicate their foundation of meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, making common cause with all beings and without apprehending anything, in order that all beings might be disciplined, brought to peace, and attain final nirvāṇa.”

24.3 Then the venerable Subhūti [F.139.b] replied to the bodhisattva great being Maitreya, “Bodhisattva great beings gather together all the roots of virtuous action endowed with the six perfections possessed by immeasurable, countless lord buddhas who have passed into final nirvāṇa in each world system of the countless, immeasurable, and inestimable world systems of the eastern direction, and by immeasurable, countless lord buddhas who have passed into final nirvāṇa in each world system of the countless, immeasurable, and inestimable world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, until they have passed into final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where no aggregates are left behind, and until their Dharma [comes to an end].

24.4 “[They also gather together all] the foundations of meritorious action originating from the generosity of those who have entered into the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the foundations of meritorious action originating from their ethical discipline and meditation, the uncontaminated roots of virtuous action associated with [the paths] of learning, and the uncontaminated roots of virtuous action associated with [the paths] of no-more-learning.

24.5 “[They also gather together] the aggregate of ethical discipline that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have, along with their aggregate of meditative stability, their aggregate of wisdom, their aggregate of liberation, and their aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation; their altruism, great compassion, and countless and immeasurable buddha attributes; the Dharma revealed by those lord buddhas and all the roots of virtuous action of those who have attained the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa after training in that Dharma that has been revealed; [F.140.a] and [the roots of virtuous action] of those who have attained the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, those who have attained the fruit on no longer being subject to rebirth, those who have attained arhatship or individual enlightenment, and those who have entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas.

24.6 “[They also gather together] the roots of virtuous action generated by them, whether the tathāgatas are present, or whether they have passed into final nirvāṇa. They rejoice with the supreme, foremost, best, perfect, most sublime, unsurpassed, and highest rejoicing, which is unequaled and equal to the unequaled. Having rejoiced in that manner, making common cause with all beings, they dedicate that foundation of their meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, with the words, ‘May we accomplish unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ If they do this, it is said that they will have entered into the vehicle of the bodhisattvas.

24.7 “If those noble children make this dedication with such thoughts, do they apprehend the foundations of meritorious action and their objective referents that give rise to such thoughts [of dedication], conceiving of them as a distinguishing mark?”

24.8 “The noble children who follow the Great Vehicle do not apprehend the foundations of meritorious action and their objective referents in such a way that they dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment while conceiving of them as a distinguishing mark,” replied Maitreya.

24.9 Subhūti then said, “Since nonexistent foundations of meritorious action are not apprehensible, if those noble children were to gather together the roots of virtuous action of the lord buddhas who are present in the world systems of the ten directions, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment for as long as their Dharma remains, and all the roots of virtuous action of those noble sons or noble daughters who dwell in the vehicles of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, [F.140.b] and all the roots of virtuous action of the [paths of] learning, and all those roots of virtuous action of the [paths of] no-more-learning, and then dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in the manner of a distinguishing mark, they would have the mistaken idea, mistaken thought, and mistaken view that the impermanent is permanent, and they would have the mistaken idea, mistaken thought, and mistaken view that suffering is happiness, that nonself is self, and that the impure is pure. But are they not without such mistaken ideas?

24.10 “Just like the foundations of meritorious actions and their objective referents, all phenomena are indeed [nonexistent]. Enlightenment also is similar, the mind is also similar, and the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are also similar. Physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are also similar. The eyes, ears, nose, tongue, body, and mental faculty are also similar. Sights, sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena are also similar. The sensory elements, the sense fields, and the links of dependent origination are also similar. The emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are also similar. The applications of mindfulness and [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, are also similar. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, [F.141.a] the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are also similar. {Ki.II-III: 125}

24.11 “In that case, just as the foundations of meritorious action and their objective referents [are nonexistent], if enlightenment is also similar, and the mind is also similar; the perfection of generosity is also similar, and the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are also similar; the emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are also similar; and the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the three gateways of liberation, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are also similar, then what are these foundations of meritorious action that are dedicated to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? What are their objective referents? What is that enlightenment? What is that mind? What are those roots of virtuous action? What is that foundation of meritorious action endowed with rejoicing?”

24.12 Maitreya replied, [F.141.b] “Bodhisattva great beings who practice the six perfections, who venerate many buddhas, who generate the roots of virtuous action, who have also been accepted by spiritual mentors, and who train in all the attributes that are empty of their own defining characteristics, do not make this dedication to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment conceiving of those foundations of meritorious action, those objective referents, those buddhas, those roots of virtuous action, or those foundations of meritorious action endowed with rejoicing as a distinguishing mark. These dedicate them not by way of duality, not by way of nonduality, not by way of signs, not by way of signlessness, not by way of apprehending, not by way of nonapprehension, not by way of affliction, not by way of purification, not by way of arising, and not by way of cessation.

24.13 “If, however, those bodhisattvas do not practice the six perfections, do not venerate many buddhas, do not generate the roots of virtuous action, are not accepted by spiritual mentors, and do not train in all the attributes that are empty of their own defining characteristics, they will then make this dedication to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment conceiving of those foundations of meritorious action, those objective referents, those lord buddhas, those roots of virtuous action, and those thoughts endowed with rejoicing as distinguishing marks.

24.14 “Blessed Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom that is revealed in this way should not be explained in the presence of a bodhisattva who has newly entered into the vehicle. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, [F.142.a] the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity that are revealed in this way should not be explained in the presence of a bodhisattva who has newly entered into the vehicle. The emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path that are revealed in this way should not be explained in the presence of a bodhisattva who has newly entered into the vehicle. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that are revealed in this way should not be explained in the presence of a bodhisattva who has newly entered into the vehicle. Knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience that are revealed in this way should not be explained in the presence of a bodhisattva who has newly entered into the vehicle. If you ask why, {Ki.II-III: 126} the mere faith that they have, the mere joy, the mere resolve, and the mere devotion that they have would be rendered nonexistent. [F.142.b]

24.15 “They should, however, be explained and revealed in the presence of bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible. This perfection of wisdom should be explained and it should be taught, just as it has been revealed, in the presence of those who have been accepted by spiritual mentors, those who have performed deeds of service on behalf of the conquerors, those who have generated the roots of virtuous action and venerated many buddhas. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity should be explained and taught, just as they have been revealed. The emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, should be explained and taught, just as they have been revealed. The applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas should be explained and taught, just as they have been revealed. Knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience should be explained and taught, just as they have been revealed. In their presence the attributes that are empty of their own defining characteristics should be explained and taught. When they hear this, they will not be afraid, they will not be frightened, and they will not be terrified. [F.143.a] It is in that manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should dedicate the foundations of meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

24.16 “Maitreya,” replied Subhūti, “if the thoughts by which they rejoice and dedicate the roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment are extinct, defunct, and nonexistent, and if these foundations of meritorious action, these objective referents, and these roots of virtuous action are also extinct, defunct, and nonexistent, what is that mind that rejoices, what are those foundations of meritorious action, what are those objective referents, and what are those roots of virtuous action that should be dedicated to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? How can the mind dedicate the mind? If the mind were to dedicate the mind in that manner, there would be two minds that would not meet! The intrinsic nature of mind cannot be dedicated.

24.17 “When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they know that the perfection of wisdom is a nonentity; that the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are nonentities; that the emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are nonentities; that the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are nonentities; that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.143.b] the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are nonentities; that the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are nonentities; and that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience are all nonentities, they should then dedicate the foundation of their meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If they make the dedication in this manner, they will make the dedication to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

24.18 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, said to the elder Subhūti, “Blessed Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered into the vehicle were to hear this teaching, they would be afraid, frightened, and terrified. Blessed Subhūti, how should bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered into the vehicle dedicate these roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? How do they, having acquired the foundation of meritorious action endowed with rejoicing, not dedicate it to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

24.19 Then the venerable Subhūti, with reference to the bodhisattva great being Maitreya, replied to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, [F.144.a] “Kauśika, if those bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered into the vehicle practice the perfection of wisdom and grasp this perfection of wisdom, without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, {Ki.II-III: 127} and the perfection of generosity, and grasp this perfection of generosity [and so forth], without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice the emptiness of internal phenomena and grasp this emptiness of internal phenomena, without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and grasp this emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice the applications of mindfulness and grasp these applications of mindfulness, without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, and grasp this noble eightfold path [and so forth], without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], [F.144.b] great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and grasp these eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness; if they practice knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience, and grasp all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], without apprehending anything and by way of signlessness, then they will have much devotion for the perfection of wisdom; they will have much devotion for the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; they will have much devotion for the emptiness of internal phenomena; they will have much devotion for the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; they will have much devotion for the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; they will have much devotion for the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; they will have much devotion for the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; they will have much devotion for the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and they will have much devotion for knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience.

24.20 “They will be favored by spiritual mentors, and those spiritual mentors will also reveal to them the six perfections in accordance with their meaning and letters. They will teach them in such a way that they will not be separated in any way from the perfection of wisdom, until they have entered upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas. [F.145.a] They will teach them in such a way that they will not be separated from the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. They will teach them in such a way that they will not be separated from all the aspects of emptiness. They will teach them in such a way that they will not be separated from the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the five extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.

24.21 “They will also teach them about the deeds of Māra, and, once they have heard about those deeds of Māra, how those deeds are without decline or increase; if you ask why, it is because those deeds of Māra are without inherent existence. Until they enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity they will not be separated from the lord buddhas. They will also generate the roots of virtuous action, and by these roots of virtuous action they will indeed secure the spiritual family of the bodhisattvas. Until they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they will never be separated from the spiritual family of the bodhisattvas.

24.22 “Moreover, Kauśika, bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered into the vehicle [F.145.b] should gather, assimilate, and evaluate all the merits accrued by immeasurable, countless tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are alive at present in the countless, immeasurable world systems in each of the directions—eastern, southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern, along with the nadir and the zenith—and by the lord buddhas along with their saṅghas of śrāvakas who teach the Dharma, and by those whose modes of conceptual elaboration have been cut off, whose verbal pathways are unimpaired, whose burden has been relinquished, whose pangs of death have been eliminated, whose fetters of rebirth have been cut off, and whose minds have been absolutely liberated by genuine understanding. [They should gather, assimilate, and evaluate] all the roots of virtue, as many as have been generated by those of great and lofty royal families, {Ki.II-III: 128} by those of great and lofty priestly families, by those of great and lofty householder families, and by the gods of Caturmahārājakāyika, Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Brahmakāyika, Brahmapariśadya, Brahmapurohita, Mahābrahmā Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parīttāśubha, Apramāṇaśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhat, Parīttabṛhat, Apramāṇabṛhat, Bṛhatphala, Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana and Akaniṣṭha, or by anyone else. They should rejoice in these [virtuous actions] with the best, most authentic, supreme, perfect, foremost, most sublime, unsurpassed, and highest rejoicing that is unequalled and equal to the unequalled. And having rejoiced, making common cause with all beings, they should dedicate those to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

24.23 Then the great bodhisattva [F.146.a] Maitreya asked the venerable Subhūti, “If bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered into the vehicle bring to mind all those roots of virtuous action of the lord buddhas and the saṅghas of the śrāvakas of the lord buddhas, and having reflected upon these, rejoice in them with the best, most authentic, supreme, perfect, foremost, most sublime, unsurpassed, and highest rejoicing that is unequalled and equal to the unequalled, and dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, how will those bodhisattva great beings not have a mistaken idea, how will they not have mistaken thoughts, and how will they not have mistaken views?”

24.24 “Maitreya,” replied Subhūti, “even though those bodhisattva great beings bring to mind the lord buddhas along with their śrāvakas, they will not perceive the buddhas, they will not perceive the śrāvakas, they will not perceive the roots of virtuous action, and they will not perceive the mind even in those thoughts through which the dedication is made. If this is the case, bodhisattva great beings who make the dedication in that manner will be without mistaken ideas, they will be without mistaken thoughts, and they will be without mistaken views. If, on the other hand, those bodhisattva great beings were to bring to mind those lord buddhas, along with their śrāvakas and those roots of virtuous action, holding them as a distinguishing mark, and after holding them as a distinguishing mark were then to dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, that would constitute a mistaken idea, [F.146.b] a mistaken thought, and a mistaken view on the part of bodhisattva great beings.

24.25 “If those bodhisattva great beings genuinely reflect on the mind by which they think of those lord buddhas, along with their śrāvakas, and know that that which is extinct is extinct, they cannot make their dedication by means of that which is extinct. {Ki.II-III: 129} Rather, it is said that it is the very reality of the mind by which the dedication is made and it is the very reality of phenomena to which the dedication is made. If they make the dedication in that manner, they will make an authentic dedication. It will not be erroneous. So that is the manner in which bodhisattva great beings should dedicate the roots of virtuous action.

24.26 “If bodhisattva great beings were to gather together, assimilate, and evaluate all the roots of virtuous action of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment for as long as their Dharma remains; as well as all the roots of virtuous action of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and among them all the roots of virtuous action generated by many ordinary persons, along with all the teachings of the Dharma that they have heard; and also among them, all the roots of virtuous action generated by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas; and all the roots of virtuous action generated by members of great and lofty royal families, by members of great and lofty priestly families, and by members of great and lofty householder families; and by the gods of Caturmahārājā-kāyika, and the gods [of other realms], up to and including Akaniṣṭha, along with all the Dharmas that they have heard, and all the settings of the mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment that they have accrued, and then were to rejoice in them with the best, most authentic, supreme, perfect, foremost, most sublime, unsurpassed, and highest rejoicing that is unequaled and equal to the unequaled, [F.147.a] and dedicate all these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment—and if they were to make this dedication, [knowing] that those attributes are extinct, defunct, nonexistent, and reversed, and that even the thought of those to whom the dedication is made is empty of inherent existence—then they will have dedicated these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

24.27 “Phenomena will not dedicate phenomena. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are empty of inherent existence. If they know this, and if they make their dedication accordingly, they will have made their dedication to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. So it is that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, and practice the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity, they will not have mistaken ideas, they will not have mistaken thoughts, and they will not have mistaken views. If you ask why, it is because these bodhisattva great beings are not attached to their dedication. They are not attached to those roots of virtuous action, and they do not observe even enlightenment. Nor do they even observe the mind of enlightenment to which they could be attached. This is the unsurpassed dedication of bodhisattva great beings.

24.28 “If bodhisattva great beings know that their accumulation of the foundation of meritorious action is devoid of the aggregates, sensory elements, and sense fields; if they know that it is devoid of the perfection of wisdom; if they know that it is devoid of the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, {Ki.II-III: 130} and [F.147.b] the perfection of generosity; if they know that it is devoid of the emptiness of internal phenomena; if they know that it is devoid of the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; if they know that it is devoid of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; and if they know that it is devoid of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings will gather the foundation of meritorious action and dedicate it to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

24.29 “If bodhisattva great beings know that that foundation of meritorious action, endowed with rejoicing, is devoid of the essential nature of this accumulation, and if they know that the lord buddhas are devoid of the essential nature of the buddhas; that the roots of virtuous action are devoid of the essential nature of the roots of virtuous action; that those accumulations are devoid of the essential nature of the accumulations; that the mind of enlightenment is devoid of the essential nature of the mind of enlightenment; that dedication is devoid of the essential nature of dedication; that enlightenment is devoid of the essential nature of enlightenment; that the perfection of wisdom is devoid of the essential nature of the perfection of wisdom; that the perfection of meditative concentration [F.148.a] is devoid of the essential nature of the perfection of meditative concentration; that the perfection of perseverance is devoid of the essential nature of the perfection of perseverance; that the perfection of tolerance is devoid of the essential nature of the perfection of tolerance; that the perfection of ethical discipline is devoid of the essential nature of the perfection of ethical discipline; that the perfection of generosity is devoid of the essential nature of the perfection of generosity; that the emptiness of internal phenomena is devoid of the essential nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena; that the emptiness of external phenomena is devoid of the essential nature of the emptiness of external phenomena; that the emptiness of external and internal phenomena is devoid of the essential nature of the emptiness of external and internal phenomena; that the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are devoid of the essential nature of the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are devoid of the essential nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways enlightenment are devoid of the essential nature of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]; and that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are devoid of the essential nature of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], then those bodhisattva great beings will accordingly practice the perfection of wisdom that is void. This is perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have.

24.30 “Moreover, if bodhisattva great beings dedicate the roots of virtuous action of those lord buddhas and their saṅghas of śrāvakas who have passed into final nirvāṇa, [F.148.b] they should make the dedication in the following manner: Just as those lord buddhas have passed into final nirvāṇa, these roots of virtuous action, too, have passed into final nirvāṇa. This dedication of those roots of virtuous action, which has been definitively made, has also passed into final nirvāṇa. The mind by which the dedication is made is also similar. If one knows this to be their essential nature, then they will dedicate these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If they make the dedication in that manner, they will have no mistaken ideas, they will have no mistaken thoughts, and they will have no mistaken views.

24.31 “When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they cognize those roots of virtuous action of the lord buddhas by way of a distinguishing mark, {Ki.II-III: 131} then they will not dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If, even though they think that all the lord buddhas of the past, as many as there are, are without distinguishing marks and without the objects of a distinguishing mark, they still engage in distinguishing marks, they would not dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. In that way they would have mistaken ideas, they would have mistaken thoughts, and they would have mistaken views.

24.32 “If bodhisattva great beings do not cognize those lord buddhas, those roots of virtuous action and their accumulations, and those settings of the mind on enlightenment, and if they do not form a distinguishing mark of them, then they will dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. In that way they will have no mistaken ideas, [F.149.a] they will have no mistaken thoughts, and they will have no mistaken views.”

24.33 Maitreya then asked, “Blessed Subhūti, how do bodhisattva great beings not form a distinguishing mark of those roots of virtuous action, and then dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“Bodhisattva great beings should train in skillful means with regard to this perfection of wisdom,” replied Subhūti. “They should know the skillful means of bodhisattva great beings that originate from the perfection of wisdom. Without relying on the perfection of wisdom, they cannot dedicate the foundation of meritorious action.”

24.34 Maitreya then said, “If one were to wonder whether there is a fault in this assertion that those lord buddhas do not even exist and are not apprehended in the perfection of wisdom, or that those roots of virtuous action, those accumulations, and those settings of the mind by which the dedication is made to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment do not even exist and are not apprehended, it is the case that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom they should think as follows: ‘If even this body of mine has ceased, and if even those roots of virtuous action, those accumulations, and those settings of the mind on enlightenment have ceased, how could I conceive of those lord buddhas, those roots of virtuous action, those accumulations, and those settings of the mind on enlightenment by forming a distinguishing mark of them?’

24.35 “The tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not approve of and do not praise those who make dedications by way of a distinguishing mark. If you ask why, it is because they form a distinguishing mark of the lord buddhas who have passed into final nirvāṇa, conceiving of them and apprehending them, would become a major apprehending on their part. [F.149.b] So it is that bodhisattva great beings who wish to dedicate those roots of virtuous action should make their dedication, without apprehending anything and without making anything into a distinguishing mark. The tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not say that it is advantageous for this dedication to be made with an idea of apprehending or the idea of a distinguishing mark. If you ask why, that dedication would be poisonous and painful. It would be just as when food, even though particularly good, of excellent color, and excellent aroma, has been mixed with poison—even though the color, aroma, and taste may well be pleasant, it nonetheless would end up being poisonous. {Ki.II-III: 132} Persons of a childish disposition or of a nonsensical disposition might consider eating it but if they do indeed eat it, there will be suffering and the ripening of suffering.

24.36 “Similarly, those who do not realize and do not understand the truth, apart from their wrong awareness, wrong cognition, and wrong training, will teach others as follows: ‘Come here, noble child. You should gather together, assimilate, and evaluate all the roots of virtuous action that the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present have gathered, [will gather, and are gathering,] after practicing the perfection of wisdom, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, until they pass into final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where no aggregates are left behind, and for as long as their Dharma remains. [You should gather together, assimilate, and evaluate] all the roots of virtuous action that they have gathered, will gather, and are gathering after practicing the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. [You should gather together, assimilate, and evaluate] all the roots of virtuous action that they have gathered, [F.150.a] will gather, and are gathering after cultivating the four meditative concentrations, and after cultivating the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the five extrasensory powers, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the four truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. [You should gather together, assimilate, and evaluate] the roots of virtuous action that they have gathered, through which they have refined, will refine, and are refining many buddhafi elds, and through which they have brought to maturity, will bring to maturity, and are bringing to maturity many beings, as well as the aggregate of ethical discipline, the aggregate of meditative stability, the aggregate of wisdom, the aggregate of liberation, and the aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation that the lord buddhas have, their wisdom of all-aspect omniscience, their abiding in unimpaired reality, and their perpetual equanimity. [You should gather together, assimilate, and evaluate] the uncontaminated roots of virtuous action that those śrāvakas have and through which they have rejoiced, will rejoice, and are rejoicing in those [aforementioned] roots of virtuous actions; [all the roots of virtuous action of] the pratyekabuddhas who have been, will be, and are being prophesied by those lord buddhas; and all the roots of virtuous action that have been generated, will be generated, and are being generated [F.150.b] by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas. You should dedicate these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’

24.37 “If such dedications are made by way of a distinguishing mark and by way of apprehending, they will be poisonous, just like that poisonous food. There will be no dedication for those who harbor notions of apprehending. If you ask why, apprehending is poisonous; it is associated with distinguishing marks, and with causes and conditions. If dedications are made in that manner, one will deprecate the tathāgatas, one will not speak in accord with the teachings of the tathāgatas, and one will also not speak in accord with the Dharma.” {Ki.II-III: 133}

24.38 [Maitreya then asked], “How then should noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas make their dedication, rejoicing in the roots of virtuous action of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present? How should they rejoice in all the roots of virtuous action that the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present have gathered, will gather, and are gathering after practicing the perfection of wisdom, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, until they pass into final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where no aggregates are left behind, and for as long as their Dharma remains? [How should they rejoice in] all the roots of virtuous action that they have gathered, will gather, and are gathering after practicing the perfection of meditative concentration, [F.151.a] the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity? [How should they rejoice in] all the roots of virtuous action that they have gathered, will gather, and are gathering after cultivating the four meditative concentrations, and after cultivating the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the five extrasensory powers, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the four truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the [complete] extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? [How should they rejoice in] the roots of virtuous action that they have gathered, through which they have refined, will refine, and are refining many buddhafiels, and through which they have brought to maturity, will bring to maturity and are bringing to maturity many beings? [How should they rejoice in] the aggregate of meditative stability, the aggregate of wisdom, the aggregate of liberation, and the aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation that the lord buddhas have, in their wisdom of all-aspect omniscience, their abiding in unimpaired reality, and their perpetual equanimity? [How should they rejoice in] the uncontaminated roots of virtuous action that those śrāvakas have and through which they have rejoiced, [F.151.b] will rejoice, and are rejoicing in those [aforementioned] roots of virtuous actions? [How should they rejoice in] all the roots of virtuous action of] the pratyekabuddhas who have been, will be, and are being prophesied by those lord buddhas, and all the roots of virtuous action that have been generated, will be generated, and are being generated by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas? When they make their dedication, should they not train, thinking that they will dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

24.39 "Maitreya," replied Subhūti, "in this regard, noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, who practice the perfection of wisdom, and who do not wish to deprecate the tathāgatas should make their dedication in the following manner: 'Just as those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas comprehend, through the unsurpassed wisdom of the buddhas, exactly what is the disposition of those roots of virtuous action, what is their intrinsic nature, and what is their defining characteristic, inasmuch as they know them, thoroughly know them, and discern³⁹² them on the basis of reality itself, I should rejoice! Just as the lord buddhas comprehend them, I will dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!'

24.40 "It is in this manner that the noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. When they make their dedication in that way, they will not deprecate the tathāgatas, they will speak in accord with the teachings of the tathāgatas, and they will speak in accord with the Dharma. The dedications of bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner are nonpoisonous [F.152.a] and perfectly replete with nectar.

24.41 "Moreover, when noble sons or noble daughters who adhere to the vehicle of the bodhisattvas {Ki.II-III:134} practice the perfection of wisdom, they should dedicate the roots of virtuous action in the following manner: Just as physical forms are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the perfection of wisdom is not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, [F.152.b] are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as the real nature, the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, reality, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, maturity with respect to all phenomena, the very limit of reality, and the inconceivable realm are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. Just as ethical discipline, meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, seeing the wisdom of liberation, [F.153.a] all-aspect omniscience, unimpaired reality, and the abiding in perpetual equanimity are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness, that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. If you ask why, it is like this: Since these are not included [in the three realms], likewise, the dedication also is not included in them and that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. The phenomena to which the dedication is made are also not included in them and that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. The phenomena that are dedicated are also not included in them and that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. The lord buddhas are also not included in them and that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. The roots of virtuous action that those lord buddhas have are also not included in them and that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present. The śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas are also not included in them, nor are their roots of virtuous action included in them, and that which is not included in them is neither past, nor future, nor present.

- 24.42 “When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, {Ki.II-III: 135} the physical forms that are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness [F.153.b] are neither past, nor future, nor present, and these cannot be dedicated by way of a distinguishing mark or by way of apprehending. If you ask why, it is because they are without inherent existence. That which is without inherent existence is a nonentity, and it is impossible to dedicate a nonentity by means of a nonentity. The feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness are neither past, nor future, nor present, and these cannot be dedicated by way of a distinguishing mark or by way of apprehending. If you ask why, it is because they are without inherent existence. That which is without inherent existence is a nonentity, and it is impossible to dedicate a nonentity by means of a nonentity. The sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [F.154.a] the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, all-aspect omniscience, unimpaired reality, and the abiding in perpetual equanimity that are not included within the realm of desire, the realm of form, or the realm of formlessness are neither past, nor future, nor present, and these cannot be dedicated by way of a distinguishing mark or by way of apprehending. If you ask why, it is because they are without inherent existence. That which is without inherent existence is a nonentity, and it is impossible to dedicate a nonentity by means of a nonentity. If they know this, bodhisattva great beings will make their dedication and it will be nonpoisonous. It will have the perfection of nectar.

24.43 “If the noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas were to dedicate those roots of virtuous action by way of a distinguishing mark or by way of apprehending, then the dedication would be wrongly made, and it would not be genuinely made. Dedications that are wrongly made are not praised by the lord buddhas. Through dedications that are not praised by the lord buddhas they will not complete the perfection of generosity. They will not complete the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They will not complete the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.154.b] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. [B37]

24.44 “Those who do not complete the six perfections and who do not complete the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas will not refine the buddhafiels, and they will not bring beings to maturity. {Ki.II-III: 136} Those who have not refined the buddhafiels and brought beings to maturity will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because their dedications are poisonous. [F.155.a]

24.45 “Moreover, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they should think as follows: ‘Just as the lord buddhas comprehend that those roots of virtuous action should be dedicated on the basis of this reality, and that once the dedication has been made in that manner they will be excellently dedicated, similarly, I too should dedicate them on the basis of this reality to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’”

24.46 Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Subhūti, “Excellent, Subhūti! Excellent! Subhūti, you, as you thus teach the mass of dedications that bodhisattva great beings make by way of signlessness, by way of nonapprehension, by way of nonarising, by way of nonceasing, by way of nonaffliction, by way of nonpurification, by way of the essential nature of nonentity, by way of the realm of phenomena, by way of the real nature, and by way of the one and only nature, you, Subhūti, are acting as the Teacher.

24.47 “Subhūti, if all beings of this great trichilocosm were to obtain the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and if they were to obtain the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, and the five extrasensory powers, do you think, Subhūti, that those beings would increase their merit on that basis?”

“Blessed Lord, they would! Sugata, they would!”

24.48 The Blessed One continued, [F.155.b] “Noble sons or noble daughters who dedicate the roots of virtuous action without attachment will increase the merit of their dedication to a much greater extent. So it is, Subhūti, that this dedication of the roots of virtuous action that noble sons or noble daughters make is said to be the best; it is said to be foremost, it is said to be sacred, it is said to be perfect, it is said to be supreme, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, and it is said to be highest.

24.49 “Moreover, Subhūti, if all the beings in this great trichilocosm, as many as there are, were to become those entering the stream to nirvāṇa, those destined for only one more rebirth, those no longer subject to rebirth, or arhats, and if some noble sons or noble daughters for the duration of their lives were to serve, respect, honor, and worship all those who are entering the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, and who are arhats with clothing, alms, bedding, medicines for the treatment of disease, and many resources, do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold on that basis?"

"It would, Blessed Lord! It would, Sugata!" {Ki.II-III: 137}

24.50 The Blessed One continued, "Subhūti, the merit dedicated by noble sons or noble daughters who dedicate the roots of virtuous action without attachment would increase manifold to a greater extent! So it is, Subhūti, that this dedication of the roots of virtuous action that noble sons or noble daughters make is said to be the best; it is said to be foremost, it is said to be sacred, it is said to be perfect, it is said to be supreme, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, and it is said to be highest.

24.51 "Moreover, Subhūti, if all the beings in this great trichiliocosm, as many as there are, were to become pratyekabuddhas, and if some noble sons or [F.156.a] noble daughters were to serve, respect, honor, and worship them with clothing, alms, bedding, medicines and many resources, do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold on that basis?"

"It would, Blessed Lord! It would, Sugata!"

24.52 The Blessed One continued, "Subhūti, the merit dedicated by noble sons or noble daughters who dedicate the roots of virtuous action without attachment would increase manifold to a greater extent! So it is, Subhūti, that this dedication of the roots of virtuous action that noble sons or noble daughters make is said to be the best; it is said to be foremost, it is said to be sacred, it is said to be perfect, it is said to be supreme, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, and it is said to be highest.

24.53 "Moreover, Subhūti, if all the beings in this great trichiliocosm, as many as there are, were to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and if all those beings, as many as there are, in the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, were to serve, respect, honor, and worship a single bodhisattva great being for eons as numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā with clothing, alms, bedding, medicines for the treatment of disease, and many resources, venerating them with all sorts of comforts—and if all those beings, as many as there are, in the world systems of each of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, [F.156.b] were to serve, respect, honor, and worship a single bodhisattva great being, for eons as numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, with clothing, alms, bedding, medicines for the treatment of disease, and many resources, venerating them with all sorts of comforts—do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold on that basis?”

24.54 “It would, Blessed Lord! It would, Sugata! Blessed Lord, it would be immeasurable, incalculable, and inestimable! Blessed Lord, it would be hard to exemplify that foundation of meritorious action! Blessed Lord, if that foundation of meritorious action were material, it could not be accommodated even in all the world systems, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā!”

24.55 The Blessed One then said, “Excellent, Subhūti! Excellent! It is so, it is as you have said! Subhūti, the merit dedicated to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by noble sons or noble daughters who dedicate the roots of virtuous action without attachment would increase manifold to a greater extent. So it is, Subhūti, that this dedication of the roots of virtuous action that noble sons or noble daughters make is said to be the best; it is said to be foremost, it is said to be sacred, {Ki.II-III: 138} it is said to be perfect, it is said to be supreme, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, and it is said to be highest.

24.56 “Subhūti, the aforementioned roots of virtuous action cannot come anywhere near matching even a hundredth part of this dedication that is free from attachment. They cannot match a thousandth part of it, a hundred thousandth part of it, a billionth part of it, a ten billionth part of it, a hundred billionth part of it, a hundred billion trillionth part of it, or even match it in any other calculation, fraction, categorization, analogy, or quality. If you ask why, it is because those aforementioned noble sons or noble daughters who possess the paths of the ten virtuous actions and who possess the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, [F.157.a] and the five extrasensory powers, harbor notions of apprehending. Similarly, those aforementioned noble sons or noble daughters who serve, respect, honor, and worship all beings who enter the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, and who have become arhats, as well as all beings who have become pratyekabuddhas, with clothing, alms, bedding, medicines for the treatment of disease, and many resources, harbor notions of apprehending.”

24.57 Then the Four Great Kings, along with twenty thousand gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm, with their palms together, joyously paid homage to the Blessed One, saying, “O Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who are skilled in means in that manner dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by way of nonapprehension, by way of nonattachment, by way of signlessness, and by way of nonaction. By whatever means they do not resort to duality, nor do they resort to nonduality. So it is that this dedication is the extremely great dedication of bodhisattva great beings.”

24.58 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, along with many thousands of gods of the Trayastrimśa realm, holding divine flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many divine ribbons, as well as playing divine musical sounds, made offerings to the Blessed One with those divine flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and divine ribbons, and then they said, “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings [F.157.b] who are skilled in means in that manner dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by way of nonapprehension, by way of signlessness, and by way of nonaction. They do not at all resort to duality, nor do they resort to nonduality. So it is that this dedication is the extremely great dedication of bodhisattva great beings.”

24.59 Then the gods Suyāma, Saṃtuṣita, Sunirmita, and Vaśavartin, along with many thousands of gods, holding divine flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many divine ribbons, as well as playing divine musical sounds, made offerings to the Blessed One with those divine flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and divine ribbons, and then they said, “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who are skilled in means in that manner dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by way of nonapprehension, by way of signlessness, and by way of nonaction. They do not in any way resort to duality, nor do they resort to nonduality. So it is that this dedication is the extremely great dedication of bodhisattva great beings.” {Ki.II-III: 139}

24.60 Then many hundred billion trillion gods of Brahmakāyika arrived in that place where the Blessed One was and prostrated with the crown of their heads at the feet of the Blessed One, and loudly gave voice to the following words: ‘Blessed Lord, it is most wonderful that those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, and retain it through their skill in means, outshine the roots of virtuous action of the aforementioned noble sons and noble daughters who are without skillful means and who are engaged in apprehending!’ [F.158.a]

24.61 Then many hundred billion trillion gods of Brahmapurohita, Brahmapariṣadya, Ābha, Parittābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parittaśubha, Apramāṇaśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhatphala, and the Pure Abodes arrived in that place where the Blessed One was and prostrated with the crown of their heads at the feet of the Blessed One, and loudly gave voice to the following words: ‘Blessed Lord, it is most wonderful that those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, and retain it through their skill in means, outshine the roots of virtuous action of the aforementioned noble sons and noble daughters who are without skillful means and who are engaged in apprehending!”

- 24.62 Then the Blessed One said to the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm and those [of the other realms], up to and including the Pure Abodes, “Divine princes, suppose that all the beings of the great trichiliocosm, as many as they are, had entered into unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and gathered together all those attributes of the past, future, and present tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the ten directions, along with their śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and those of the lord buddhas from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment to as long as their Dharma endures, along with their śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, and all beings—attributes comprising their perfection of generosity, their perfection of ethical discipline, their perfection of tolerance, their perfection of perseverance, their perfection of meditative concentration, and their perfection of wisdom; and their [ordinary] generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, [F.158.b] perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom; and their aggregate of ethical discipline, their aggregate of meditative stability, their aggregate of wisdom, their aggregate of liberation, and their aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation; and the other immeasurable attributes of the buddhas, whatever they might be—and suppose they were to rejoice in them, and having rejoiced in that manner, were indeed to dedicate these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by way of apprehending. If, compared to them, some noble son or noble daughter had entered into unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and gathered together all those attributes of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, from the time when they first begin to set the mind on enlightenment [Ki.II-III: 140] to as long as their Dharma endures, along with their śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas—attributes comprising their perfection of generosity, their perfection of ethical discipline, their perfection of tolerance, their perfection of perseverance, their perfection of meditative concentration, and their perfection of wisdom, [and so forth], up to and including the other immeasurable attributes of the buddhas, whatever they might be—and if they were to rejoice in them,—rejoicing by way of nonapprehension, by way of nonduality, by way of signlessness, by way of nonattachment, and by way of nonaction,—and if they were to rejoice in them—rejoicing with this foremost, sacred, supreme, perfect, sublime, unsurpassed, and highest of rejoicing that is unequalled and equal to the unequalled—and were then to dedicate those roots of virtuous action endowed with rejoicing to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, by way of nonapprehension, by way of nonduality, by way of signlessness, by way of nonattachment, and by way of nonaction, compared to the former noble sons or noble daughters, the merit of this one noble son or noble daughter would increase manifold to a greater extent. [F.159.a] The aforementioned roots of virtuous action would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of that one's roots of virtuous action. They would not match them [in any way], up to and including in quality. This dedication of bodhisattva great beings that is made without apprehending anything is said to be supreme, [and so forth]. It is said to be equal to the unequalled."

24.63 Then the venerable Subhūti inquired of the Blessed One, "The Blessed Lord has said that the noble sons or noble daughters who have gathered, assimilated, and evaluated all those roots of virtuous action rejoice in them with the best of rejoicing, [and so forth], up to and including rejoicing that is unequalled, and equal to the unequalled. Blessed Lord, how is this the best of rejoicing? How is it rejoicing that is equal to the unequalled, [and so forth]?"

24.64 The Blessed One replied, "When noble sons or noble daughters neither accept nor reject those roots of virtuous action of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past, future, and present, along with their saṅghas of śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, and all beings, and when they neither make assumptions about them, nor shirk away from them or apprehend them, but instead think that in them there is nothing at all that arises, nothing at all that ceases, nothing at all that is afflicted, nothing at all that is purified, nothing at all that decreases, nothing at all that increases, nothing at all that comes, and nothing at all that is aggregated, and, as this formulation explains, say, 'I will rejoice on the basis of the real nature of phenomena of the past, future, and present, the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, reality, the abiding nature of reality, and maturity with respect to all phenomena! [F.159.b] Having rejoiced in them, I will dedicate these roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment,' the rejoicing that bodhisattva great beings have when they make their dedication in that manner is the best. The rejoicing that they have is equal to the unequalled, [and so forth].

24.65 "Subhūti, all extraneous sorts of rejoicing other than this come nowhere near even a hundredth part of this rejoicing. They do not match it [in any way], up to and including in quality. This rejoicing is said to be best, in comparison to other, extraneous sorts of rejoicing. It is said to be foremost, it is said to be sacred, it is said to be perfect, it is said to be supreme, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, it is said to be highest, it is said to be unequalled, and it is said to be equal to the unequalled.

“Moreover, Subhūti, when noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas {Ki.II-III: 141} wish to rejoice in the roots of virtuous action belonging to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past, future, and present, along with their śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment to as long as their Dharma endures—attributes comprising the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and all other attributes, up to and including the immeasurable attributes of the buddhas, as well as all the roots of virtuous action of all beings, as many as there are—then they should rejoice as follows: ‘Just like liberation are physical forms. Just like liberation are feelings. Just like liberation are perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Just like liberation are the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. [F.160.a] Just like liberation is the perfection of generosity. Just like liberation are the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Just like liberation are the emptiness of internal phenomena and the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Just like liberation are the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. Just like liberation are the truths of the noble ones. Just like liberation are the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. Just like liberation are the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. Just like liberation are the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. Just like liberation are the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Just like liberation is seeing the wisdom of liberation. Just like liberation is the aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation. Just like liberation is resolution. Just like liberation is rejoicing. Just like liberation are the Dharmas of the past, future, and present. Just like liberation are those lord buddhas. Just like liberation is the final nirvāṇa of those lord buddhas. Just like liberation are the śrāvakas of those lord buddhas [F.160.b] and the final nirvāṇa of those śrāvakas. Just like liberation are the pratyekabuddhas and the final nirvāṇa of those pratyekabuddhas. Just like liberation is the reality of those lord buddhas. Just like liberation is the reality of those śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Just like liberation is the reality of all phenomena!’

- 24.67 “So it is that on the basis of the reality of phenomena that are without attachment, without bondage, without liberation, without fixation, and without afflictive mental states, and the reality in which phenomena are nonarising, uncreated, unoriginated, and unceasing, the dedication should be made to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, because there is no change and there is no decay.
- 24.68 “Subhūti, this is the best of the rejoicing of bodhisattva great beings. This is the rejoicing that is equal to the unequaled, [and so forth]. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who possess this rejoicing will swiftly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.II-III: 142}
- 24.69 “Moreover, Subhūti, suppose any noble sons or noble daughters following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should serve, respect, honor, and worship with food, alms, bedding, medicines for the treatment of disease, many resources, and many comforts the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas and their saṅghas of śrāvakas—that is to say, the lord buddhas and their communities of śrāvakas, as many as are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, and the lord buddhas and their communities of śrāvakas, as many as are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in the world systems of each of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā—and [F.161.a] suppose, even after those lord buddhas had passed into final nirvāṇa, they were to engage in experiential cultivation in order to serve, respect, honor, and worship their pearl relics, day and night, with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons, and suppose they were to maintain ethical discipline by way of apprehending, cultivate tolerance by way of apprehending, undertake perseverance by way of apprehending, be absorbed in meditative concentration by way of apprehending, and cultivate wisdom by way of apprehending. In contrast to them, when noble sons or noble daughters who have entered into unsurpassed, complete enlightenment practice the perfection of generosity without apprehending anything, and practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom without apprehending anything, if they dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment with skill in means, then the accumulated merit of the former will not even come close to matching a hundredth part of their accumulated merit and accumulated virtue; nor will it match it in any quality [and so forth]. This dedication is said to be the best, it is said to be the highest, [and so forth].

24.70 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity, and [F.161.b] practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, without apprehending anything, they should dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, with skill in means.”

24.71 This completes the twenty-fourth chapter, “Dedication,” from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

- 25.1 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom sheds light owing to its utter purity. Venerable Lord, the perfection of wisdom is worthy of homage. Blessed Lord, I pay homage to the perfection of wisdom. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is unsullied by all the three realms. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom dispels all the blindness of afflicted mental states and false views, rendering obfuscation nonexistent.³⁹³ Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is supreme among the factors conducive to enlightenment. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom secures happiness so that all fears, enmity, and harmful [thoughts or deeds] may be purified. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom brings light to all beings so that they might acquire the five eyes. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom teaches the path to those who are going astray so that they might reverse the [two] extremes. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom establishes all-aspect omniscience, so that all afflicted mental states that bring about reincarnation through the continuity of propensities might be abandoned. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom [F.162.a] is the mother of bodhisattva great beings, {Ki.II-III: 143} generating the attributes of the buddhas. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom neither arises nor ceases owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is the antidote for cyclic existence because it is neither permanent, nor is it perishable. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom offers protection to beings who lack protection because it bestows the entirety of the precious doctrine. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom confers the ten powers because it cannot be crushed. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom turns the wheel of the Dharma, repeating it three times and in twelve ways,³⁹⁴ because it is subject to neither promulgation nor reversal. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom displays the essential nature of all phenomena owing to the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Blessed Lord, how can bodhisattvas or those in the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, śrāvakas or those in the vehicle of the śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas or those in the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas dwell in the perfection of wisdom?"

25.2 "Śāradvatīputra," replied the Blessed One, "they should dwell in the perfection of wisdom, just as they dwell alongside the Teacher. They should pay homage to the perfection of wisdom, just as they pay homage to the Teacher. If you ask why, this perfection of wisdom is itself the Teacher. The Teacher is not one distinct thing, and the perfection of wisdom another. Rather, the Teacher himself is indeed the perfection of wisdom and the nature of the perfection of wisdom is indeed the Teacher. This is why the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas emerge from the perfection of wisdom, as do bodhisattva great beings, [F.162.b] pratyekabuddhas, arhats, those who are no longer subject to rebirth, those who are destined for only one more rebirth, and those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa. This is why the paths of the ten virtuous actions emerges from the perfection of wisdom, as do the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the five extrasensory powers, the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the four truths of the noble ones,³⁹⁵ the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience."

25.3 Thereupon, Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, thought, "What is the basis of this question that the venerable Śāradvatīputra has asked? What is the reason for it?"

25.4 The venerable Śāradvatīputra then said to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, "Kauśika, bodhisattva great beings who have acquired the perfection of wisdom, owing to their skillful means, [F.163.a] have gathered together all those roots of virtuous action possessed by the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment and lasting as long as the Dharma itself endures, along with those [roots of virtuous action] of the community of śrāvakas, those of the pratyekabuddhas, and those of all beings, and they have then dedicated these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That is the basis of the question I asked.

25.5 “Kauśika, this perfection of wisdom possessed by bodhisattva great beings outshines the perfection of generosity, {Ki.II-III: 144} and it outshines the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, and the perfection of meditative concentration. Kauśika, just as if those who are born blind, whether they number a hundred, a thousand, or a hundred thousand, cannot set out on a road without a guide, how could they enter a city! In the same way, Kauśika, those five other perfections resemble one who is born blind. If there is no perfection of wisdom, they will have no guide, so if they cannot even generate the path of enlightenment, how could they enter the citadel of all-aspect omniscience! However, Kauśika, when the five other perfections have been acquired through the perfection of wisdom, these five perfections will be endowed with vision. Indeed, it is because they are acquired by means of the perfection of wisdom that they are designated as perfections.”

25.6 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, inquired of the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, you say that these five perfections are designated as perfections inasmuch as they have been acquired by means of the perfection of wisdom. However, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, [F.163.b] in addition to that, are these five perfections not designated as perfections because they are also acquired by means of the perfection of generosity? Similarly, are these five perfections not designated as perfections because they are also acquired by means of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, and the perfection of meditative concentration?”

25.7 “Kauśika,” he replied, “that is not so! That is not so! These five perfections are not designated as perfections because they are acquired by means of the perfection of generosity. These five perfections are not designated as perfections because they are acquired by means of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, or the perfection of meditative concentration. Rather, it is the case that these five perfections are designated as perfections because they are acquired by means of the perfection of wisdom. Kauśika, bodhisattva great beings who dwell in the perfection of wisdom fully perfect the perfection of generosity, and they fully perfect the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. So it is, Kauśika, that the perfection of wisdom is said to be better than these five other perfections. It is said to be the foremost, sacred, the supreme, perfect, sublime, unsurpassed, and the highest.”

25.8 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how should the perfection of wisdom be brought into being?”

25.9 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of physical forms. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. [F.164.a] The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the perfection of generosity. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, and the perfection of meditative concentration. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the emptiness of internal phenomena. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.II-III: 145} In this way, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being of all phenomena.”

25.10 “Blessed Lord, how is the perfection of wisdom to be brought into being [F.164.b] so that there is no bringing into being of physical forms? How is perfection of wisdom to be brought into being so that there is no bringing into being [of all these other attributes and attainments], up to and including all phenomena?”

- 25.11 The Blessed One replied, “The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being by physical forms not being conditioned, by physical forms not arising, by physical forms not ceasing, by physical forms not being apprehensible, and by physical forms not disintegrating. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being by [all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all phenomena, not being conditioned, by their not arising, not ceasing, not being apprehensible, not disintegrating.”
- 25.12 “Blessed Lord, when the perfection of wisdom is brought into being in that manner, what is attained?”
 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom that has been brought into being in that manner attains nothing at all. Inasmuch as it does not attain anything at all, it may be styled ‘the perfection of wisdom.’ ”
- 25.13 “Blessed Lord, what are all those phenomena that are not attained?”
 The Blessed One replied, “Nonvirtuous phenomena are not attained. Virtuous phenomena are not attained. Mundane phenomena, supramundane phenomena, contaminated phenomena, uncontaminated phenomena, objectionable phenomena, nonobjectionable phenomena, conditioned phenomena, and unconditioned phenomena are not attained. If you ask why, the perfection of wisdom is not established for the sake of anything at all by way of apprehending. For this reason, nothing at all is attained.”
- 25.14 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, does this perfection of wisdom not even attain all-aspect omniscience?”
 “Kauśika,” replied the Blessed One, [F.165.a] “you have asked whether this perfection of wisdom does not even attain all-aspect omniscience. Kauśika, it is so! It is so! This perfection of wisdom does not attain and does not apprehend even all-aspect omniscience.”
- 25.15 “Blessed Lord, in what way does the perfection of wisdom not attain and not apprehend even all-aspect omniscience?” asked Śakra.
 “Kauśika,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom, just as if it were a designation, a distinguishing mark, or a conditioning, likewise does not attain anything.”
- 25.16 “Blessed Lord, how then does it bring about attainment?” asked Śakra.
 The Blessed One replied, “It brings about attainment insofar as it does not apprehend, accept, dwell in, abandon, or adhere to anything. {Ki.II-III: 146} Nothing at all is attained. Kauśika, so it is that the perfection of wisdom does not attain any phenomena. It does not attain anything at all.”

- 25.17 Then Śakra said, “Blessed Lord, how wonderful that this perfection of wisdom is established because all phenomena neither arise nor do they cease, and that they are unconditioned, nonapprehensible, and imperishable!”
- 25.18 Thereupon, the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they wonder whether the perfection of wisdom brings about the attainment of all phenomena, but perceive to the contrary that the perfection of wisdom does not bring about the attainment of all phenomena, in that case, Blessed Lord, those bodhisattvas would undervalue the perfection of wisdom. [F.165.b] Blessed Lord, those bodhisattvas would shun the perfection of wisdom.”
- 25.19 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “there is a specific way in which bodhisattva great beings might undervalue the perfection of wisdom and shun the perfection of wisdom. If, when bodhisattvas practice the perfection of wisdom, they were to think, ‘Alas! This perfection of wisdom is hollow. Alas! This perfection of wisdom is void. Alas! This perfection of wisdom is pointless,’ in that case, those bodhisattva great beings would undervalue the perfection of wisdom. Those bodhisattva great beings would shun the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, that is the distinct way in which bodhisattva great beings might undervalue the perfection of wisdom and in which bodhisattva great beings might shun the perfection of wisdom.”
- 25.20 “Blessed Lord, what are the phenomena in which one who has conviction in the perfection of wisdom should not have conviction?”
- 25.21 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if one has conviction in the perfection of wisdom, one will not have conviction in physical forms. One will not have conviction in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. One will not have conviction in the eyes, and one will not have conviction in the ears, nose, tongue, body, or mental faculty. One will not have conviction in sights, and one will not have conviction in sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, or mental phenomena. One will not have conviction in visual consciousness, and one will not have conviction in auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, [F.166.a] tactile consciousness, or mental consciousness. One will not have conviction in visually compounded sensory contact, and one will not have conviction in aurally compounded sensory contact, nasally compounded sensory contact, lingually compounded sensory contact, corporeally compounded sensory contact, or mentally compounded sensory contact. One will not have conviction in feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact, and one will not have conviction in feelings conditioned by aurally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by nasally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by lingually compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by corporeally compounded sensory contact, or feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact. One will not have conviction in the earth element, and one will not have conviction in the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, or the consciousness element. One will not have conviction in ignorance, and one will not have conviction in formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, or aging and death. One will not have conviction in the perfection of generosity, and one will not have conviction in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. One will not have conviction in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and one will not have conviction in the emptiness of external phenomena or the emptiness of external and internal phenomena. One will not have conviction in the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. One will not have conviction in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. One will not have conviction in the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, [F.166.b] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. One will not have conviction in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and one will not have conviction in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship. One will not have conviction in individual enlightenment. One will not have conviction in knowledge of the path, and one will not have conviction in all-aspect omniscience.” {Ki.II-III: 147}

25.22 “Blessed Lord, how is it that those with conviction in the perfection of wisdom will not have confidence in physical forms? How is it that they will not have confidence in [all those phenomena, attributes, and attainments,] up to and including all-aspect omniscience?”

25.23 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “they will have conviction in the perfection of wisdom because physical forms are nonapprehensible. They will have conviction in the perfection of wisdom because [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are nonapprehensible. So it is that those with conviction in the perfection of wisdom will not have conviction in physical forms, and they will not have conviction in [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

“Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the great perfection!”

25.24 “Subhūti, for what reasons do you think this perfection of wisdom is the great perfection?” asked the Blessed One.

25.25 “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom does not enhance physical forms, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, [F.167.a] nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the perfection of generosity, nor does it diminish it. It does not enhance the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, or the perfection of meditative concentration, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the emptiness of internal phenomena, nor does it diminish it. It does not enhance the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, or [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, or wishlessness, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment, nor does it diminish them. It does not enhance knowledge of the path, enlightenment, the buddhas, or the attributes of the buddhas, nor does it diminish them.

25.26 “Moreover, the perfection of wisdom does not absorb physical forms, nor does it diffuse them. It does not absorb feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, nor does it diffuse them. [F.167.b] It does not absorb [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, nor does it diffuse them.

- 25.27 “Moreover, the perfection of wisdom does not measure physical forms, nor does it not measure them. It does not measure [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, nor does it not measure them.
- 25.28 “Moreover, the perfection of wisdom does not enlarge physical forms, nor does it contract them. It does not enlarge [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, nor does it contract them.
- 25.29 “Moreover, the perfection of wisdom does not strengthen physical forms, nor does it weaken them. Similarly, it does not strengthen feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, nor does it weaken them. It does not strengthen [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, nor does it weaken them.
- 25.30 “Blessed Lord, this formulation explains how this perfection of wisdom is the great perfection, possessed by bodhisattva great beings.
- 25.31 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered the [great] vehicle, relying on the perfection of wisdom, and relying on the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity, perceive that the perfection of wisdom neither enhances nor diminishes physical forms, and that it neither enhances nor diminishes [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, or that it [neither absorbs nor diffuses, neither measures nor does not measure, neither enlarges nor contracts, and] neither strengthens nor weakens physical forms, and that it neither strengthens nor weakens [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, in that case, Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who perceive in such a way do not practice the perfection of wisdom.³⁹⁶ [F.168.a] If one were to ask why, it is because anything that enhances or diminishes physical forms is not an outcome compatible with the perfection of wisdom. Anything that enhances or diminishes [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, is not an outcome compatible with the perfection of wisdom. Anything that [absorbs or diffuses, measures or does not measure, enlarges or contracts, or] strengthens or weakens physical forms is not an outcome compatible with the perfection of wisdom. Anything that strengthens or weakens [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, is not an outcome compatible with the perfection of wisdom.

25.32 “Blessed Lord, when they practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, anything that enhances or diminishes physical forms, anything that enhances or diminishes [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, or anything that [absorbs or diffuses, measures or does not measure, enlarges or contracts, or] strengthens or weakens physical forms, and anything that [absorbs or diffuses, measures or does not measure, enlarges or contracts, or] strengthens or weakens [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, the buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, becomes their great apprehending. If you ask why, it is because there is said to be no enlightenment for those with apprehending perception.

25.33 “Owing to the fact that beings are nonarising, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is nonarising. Owing to the fact that physical forms are nonarising, {Ki.II-III: 148} you should see that the perfection of wisdom is nonarising. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are nonarising, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are nonarising, [F.168.b] you should see that the perfection of wisdom is nonarising.

25.34 “Owing to the fact that beings are without inherent existence, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is without inherent existence. Owing to the fact that physical forms are without inherent existence, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is without inherent existence. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are without inherent existence, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are without inherent existence, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is without inherent existence.

25.35 “Owing to the fact that beings are without entity, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is without entity. Owing to the fact that physical forms are without entity, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is without entity. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are without entity, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are without entity, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is without entity.

- 25.36 “Owing to the fact that beings are emptiness, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is emptiness. Owing to the fact that physical forms are emptiness, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is emptiness. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are emptiness, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are emptiness, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is emptiness.
- 25.37 “Owing to the fact that beings are void, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is void. Owing to the fact that physical forms are void, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is void. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are void, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are void, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is void.
- 25.38 “Owing to the fact that beings are nonexistent, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is nonexistent. Owing to the fact that physical forms are nonexistent, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is nonexistent. [F.169.a] Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are nonexistent, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are nonexistent, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is nonexistent.
- 25.39 “Owing to the fact that beings are inconceivable, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is inconceivable. Owing to the fact that physical forms are inconceivable, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is inconceivable. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are inconceivable, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are inconceivable, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is inconceivable.
- 25.40 “Owing to the fact that beings are indestructible, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is indestructible. Owing to the fact that physical forms are indestructible, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is indestructible. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are indestructible, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are indestructible, you should see that the perfection of wisdom is indestructible.

- 25.41 “Owing to the fact that beings do not attain consummate buddhahood, you should see that the perfection of wisdom does not attain consummate buddhahood. Owing to the fact that physical forms do not attain consummate buddhahood, you should see that the perfection of wisdom does not attain consummate buddhahood. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness do not attain consummate buddhahood, and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, do not attain consummate buddhahood, [F.169.b] you should see that the perfection of wisdom does not attain consummate buddhahood.
- 25.42 “Owing to the fact that beings are not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas], you should see that the perfection of wisdom is not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas]. Owing to the fact that physical forms are not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas], you should see that the perfection of wisdom is not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas]. Owing to the fact that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas], and that [all those other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including enlightenment, buddhas, and the attributes of the buddhas, are not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas], you should see that the perfection of wisdom is not endowed with the consummate powers [of the tathāgatas].
- 25.43 “This formulation explains, Blessed Lord, how this perfection of wisdom is the great perfection, possessed by bodhisattva great beings.”
- 25.44 This completes the twenty-fifth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 26: THE HELLS

- 26.1 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, where did those bodhisattva great beings who are resolute in this profound perfection of wisdom pass away before coming into this world? For how long have those noble sons or noble daughters embarked on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? How many tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have they honored? {Ki.II-III: 149} Are they genuinely and methodically³⁹⁷ resolute in this profound perfection of wisdom? How long have they practiced the perfection of generosity? How long have they practiced the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, [F.170.a] the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom?”
- 26.2 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “those bodhisattva great beings have come into this world, and have been reborn in this world, after venerating immeasurable, countless tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, throughout the world systems of the ten directions. Śāradvatīputra, those bodhisattva great beings have practiced the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom for countless, immeasurable, and inestimable hundred billion trillions of eons. Over countless, immeasurable, and inestimable hundred billion trillions of eons, they have entered upon unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That is to say, from the time when they first began to set their mind on enlightenment onward, they have practiced the perfection of generosity and then come into this world. [Similarly], they have practiced the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and then come into this world. From that time onward they have venerated countless, immeasurable, inestimable, inconceivable, and incomparable tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, and then come into this world and taken rebirth in it. Śāradvatīputra, when those bodhisattva great beings see or hear this perfection of wisdom, they will think, 'I have seen the Teacher.' They will think, 'I have heard the Teacher.' Śāradvatīputra, those bodhisattva great beings [F.170.b] will pursue this perfection of wisdom, genuinely and methodically, in a nondual manner and without apprehending anything."³⁹⁸

26.3 Thereupon, the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, "Blessed Lord, can the perfection of wisdom be heard or seen?"

26.4 "Subhūti, that is not the case!" replied the Blessed One. "Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is not heard and it is not seen. Even the nature of the perfection of wisdom is neither heard nor seen. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the perfection of wisdom. Similarly, owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the emptiness of internal phenomena. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the applications of mindfulness. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, [F.171.a] the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment. Owing to the inanimate nature of phenomena, they neither hear nor see knowledge of the path, enlightenment, the buddhas, or the attributes of the buddhas." [B38]

- 26.5 “Blessed Lord, how long have bodhisattva great beings who persevere in this profound perfection of wisdom engaged in its practice?” {Ki.II-III: 150}
- 26.6 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “here there is a distinction that must be explained. Subhūti, there are some bodhisattva great beings who, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, persevere in this profound perfection of wisdom without apprehending anything, and [similarly] persevere in the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. They do not abandon anything at all because they see neither increase nor decrease. They are never separated from the six perfections, and they are never separated from the lord buddhas. They will even accomplish those roots of virtuous action by which they seek to serve, respect, honor, and worship the lord buddhas, simply by setting their minds upon them. [F.171.b] They travel from buddhafield to buddhafield and are never reborn in the womb of a mother. They are never separated from the extrasensory powers and they do not associate with afflicted mental states. They do not coexist with the mindsets of the śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas. They are styled as bringing beings to maturity, refining the buddhafields and traveling from buddhafield to buddhafield. Subhūti, such bodhisattva great beings persevere in this profound perfection of wisdom.
- 26.7 “On the other hand, Subhūti, there are some noble sons or noble daughters following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who have seen many hundreds of buddhas, many thousands of buddhas, many hundred million trillions of buddhas, and who, in their presence, have given gifts, maintained ethical discipline, cultivated tolerance, undertaken perseverance, developed meditative concentration, and cultivated wisdom, all by way of apprehending. When this profound perfection of wisdom was being revealed, they departed elsewhere from the assembly. When this profound perfection of wisdom was being revealed, those noble sons or noble daughters following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas departed elsewhere from the presence of those lord buddhas, without honoring them. If you ask why, it is because those noble sons or noble daughters following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, who departed elsewhere from the assembly when this profound perfection of wisdom was being revealed, even at the present time depart elsewhere from the assembly when this profound perfection of wisdom is revealed. They do not practice harmoniously, with body and mind. [F.172.a] They have accrued deeds that obscure wisdom. By engaging in and accruing deeds that obscure wisdom, when this profound perfection of wisdom is revealed, they abandon it. By abandoning this perfection of wisdom they abandon the all-aspect omniscience of the lord buddhas of the past, the future, and the present. Those who have engaged in and accrued deeds that emerge from the abandoning of all-aspect omniscience have engaged in and accrued deeds that are destitute of the Dharma. Those who have engaged in and accrued deeds that are destitute of the Dharma will roast³⁹⁹ among the denizens of the hells for many years, for many hundreds of years, [Ki.II-III: 151] for many thousands of years, and for many hundred billion trillions of years.

26.8 “Then they will proceed from being denizens of great hells to being denizens of more great hells, and, when they proceed from being denizens of great hells to being denizens of more great hells, they will be destroyed by infernos, they will be destroyed by water, and they will be destroyed by wind. Even when they are destroyed in that manner by infernos, when they are destroyed by water or destroyed by wind, they will be cast among the denizens of the great hells in other world systems. They will be cast there and burned there. Even having been cast there and reborn there, they will proceed from being denizens of great hells to being denizens of more great hells, and when they proceed from being denizens of great hells to being denizens of more great hells, they will be destroyed by infernos, they will be destroyed by water, or they will be destroyed by wind. And even when they are destroyed by infernos, destroyed by water, or destroyed by wind in that manner, [F.172.b] they will again be cast among the denizens of the great hells in the eastern direction, and they will be cast among the denizens of the great hells in the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith. In them, too, they will proceed from being denizens of great hells to being denizens of more great hells, and once again they will be destroyed by infernos, destroyed by water, or destroyed by wind. And when they have been destroyed by infernos, destroyed by water, or destroyed by wind in that manner, they will pass away and be reborn here in this world because their past actions in destroying the Dharma will still not have been exhausted. Yet again they will proceed from the being denizens of great hells to being denizens of more great hells, and having been born there, they will once again experience the sufferings of the denizens of the great hells. There they will endure the sufferings of the denizens of the hells until they have again been destroyed by infernos, destroyed by water, or destroyed by wind.

26.9 “Even after they have been destroyed by infernos, destroyed by water, or destroyed by wind, they will pass away and be reborn in the world systems of the eastern direction, equal in fortune to creatures of the animal realms, and they will be reborn in the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, equal in fortune to creatures of the animal realms.

26.10 “Then again, they will be reborn in the worlds of Yama, in the world systems of all the ten directions, and, having been reborn in them, they will experience many sufferings. Once the karma [associated with such sufferings] has been exhausted, even though in some cases they might acquire a human birth, through the ripening of the past actions that they indulged in, accrued, accomplished, completed, and perfected in destroying the Dharma, wherever they are reborn, [F.173.a] they will be born into families of the blind, they will be born into families of refuse scavengers, they will be born into families of outcastes, and they will be born into families of reed makers. Being reborn in those states, they will be blind, lame, without a nose, without a tongue, without arms, without legs, leprous, with white-blotched skin, or decrepit. They will always be reborn in places where the word buddha is nonexistent, where the word Dharma is nonexistent, and where the word saṅgha is nonexistent.”

26.11 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, compared to this indulging in and accruing of deeds that would destroy the Dharma, are not even the five inexpressible crimes no more than a pale reflection?”

26.12 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “when this profound perfection of wisdom is revealed and explained, they think they should abandon it, saying, ‘We should not train in this! This is not the Dharma! This is not the Vinaya! {Ki.II-III: 152} This is not the teaching of the Teacher! This has not been spoken by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas!’ They themselves abandon it, and they also render other beings irresolute. They themselves injure their own thoughts, and then injure the thoughts of others. They themselves poison their own thoughts, and then they delight in poisoning the thoughts of others. They themselves have squandered opportunities and they delight in squandering the opportunities of others. They themselves wish to abandon the profound perfection of wisdom owing to their unknowing and ignorance, and they also induce others to do so. Compared to this indulging in and accruing of deeds that would destroy the Dharma, even the five inexpressible crimes are indeed but a pale reflection! [F.173.b]

26.13 “Śāradvatīputra, I do not permit such individuals even to hear it, let alone encounter it, let alone associate with it! I do not mention it. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, you should know that such individuals defame the Dharma. Śāradvatīputra, you should know that such individuals have bad intentions

- and they side with evil. Śāradvatīputra, those who think they should hear the words of such individuals, or think they should trust in them, will also be destitute on account of their unseemly fears.
- 26.14 “Śāradvatīputra, you should know that those who defame the perfection of wisdom defame the Dharma. You should know that they become denizens of the hells or the animal realm, or become inhabitants of the world of Yama.”
- 26.15 “Blessed Lord, the Blessed One has not yet spoken of the physical states of those individuals who will be reborn in those inferior realms, having defamed the Dharma.”
- 26.16 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “do not speak of the physical states of those individuals who will be reborn in those inferior realms, having defamed the Dharma! If you ask why, anyone hearing the description of the physical states of those individuals who have defamed the Dharma would immediately vomit blood, die, experience life-threatening sufferings, be pained with sorrow, or become shriveled and withered like stalks that have been scythed. If indeed one were to hear the description of the physical states of individuals who are born in these inferior realms, there would be so much evil! Such are their physical states!” With these words, the Blessed One refused to take the opportunity put by the venerable Śāradvatīputra.
- 26.17 “Blessed Lord, so that it will be apparent to living beings of the future, please reveal what sorts of physical bodies will be obtained by individuals who defame the Dharma through having indulged in and accrued the karma that would destroy the Dharma!”
- 26.18 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied [F.174.a] the Blessed One, “those individuals who have indulged in, accrued, completed, perfected, acquired, and fulfilled deeds that would destroy the Dharma will experience sufferings among the denizens of the hells over a long period of time. They will experience sufferings among animals for a long time and they will experience sufferings in the world of Yama for a long time. Such should be made apparent to living beings of the future.”
- 26.19 “Blessed Lord, it will be so! Sugata, it will be so! Blessed Lord, on that very basis, individuals of the spiritual family who are of positive disposition will abandon such errors and they will not abandon the Dharma, even for the sake of their own lives, saying, ‘Would that we might not experience such sufferings!’ ”
- 26.20 Thereupon, the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, {Ki.II-III: 153} “Blessed Lord, if noble sons or noble daughters were to hear this description of the errors of those individuals who abandon the Dharma, they should be absolutely restrained in their physical, verbal, and mental actions, saying, ‘Otherwise we shall experience such sufferings in inferior existences! We shall not behold the tathāgatas. We shall not hear the Dharma. We shall not even respect or venerate the saṅgha. We shall be born in buddhafiels where a buddha has not yet appeared. We shall become impoverished. We shall become extremely avaricious!" and so on."

26.21 Again, the venerable Subhūti addressed the Blessed One: "Blessed Lord, those who have indulged in and accrued negative actions of speech have indulged in and accrued deeds that would destroy the Dharma."

26.22 The Blessed One then said, "Subhūti, those who have indulged in and accrued negative deeds of speech [F.174.b] have indulged in and accrued deeds that would destroy the Dharma. Subhūti, there are deluded persons who intend to defame this perfection of wisdom and intend to reject it. However, these will not go forth according to the Dharma and the Vinaya.⁴⁰⁰ Subhūti, by defaming and rejecting the perfection of wisdom, they defame and reject the enlightenment of the lord buddhas. By defaming and rejecting the enlightenment of the buddhas, they defame and reject the all-aspect omniscience of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past, the future, and the present. By defaming and rejecting all-aspect omniscience, they defame and reject the Dharma. By defaming and rejecting the Dharma, they reject the saṅgha. By rejecting the saṅgha, they reject the genuine view concerning the world. By rejecting the genuine view concerning the world, they reject the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They reject the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they reject [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They reject the four applications of mindfulness, and they reject [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path. They reject the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions. They reject the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the five extrasensory powers. They reject all the meditative stabilities, [F.175.a] all the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They reject knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience. By rejecting all-aspect omniscience, they acquire an inestimable, incalculable, and immeasurable mass of demerit. By acquiring an inestimable, incalculable, and immeasurable mass of demerit, they experience inestimable, incalculable, and immeasurable sufferings and discomforts among the denizens of the hells, among animals, and among anguished spirits."

26.23 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, in what ways do those deluded persons who reject this profound perfection of wisdom, actually reject it?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “those deluded persons reject the perfection of wisdom in four ways.”

26.24 “What are the four ways?”

The Blessed One replied, “Those deluded persons who reject this profound perfection of wisdom are under the influence of Māra, and as a result of that first cause, Subhūti, they reject this profound perfection of wisdom. They have no conviction, faith, or devotion with respect to profound attributes, and as a result of that second cause they reject this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, those deluded persons fall into the clutches of evil associates, {Ki.II-III: 154} lack perseverance, and are fixated on the five aggregates, and as a result of that third cause they reject this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, [F.175.b] those deluded persons conduct themselves in ways imbued with hatred, praising themselves and deprecating others, and as a result of that fourth cause they reject this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, in these four ways deluded persons reject this profound perfection of wisdom.”

26.25 “Blessed Lord, it is difficult for those who lack perseverance, who are without the roots of virtuous action, and who are in the clutches of evil associates to have devotion to this profound perfection of wisdom.”

26.26 “Subhūti, it is so!” replied the Blessed One. “It is difficult for those who lack perseverance, who are without the roots of virtuous action, and who have fallen into in the clutches of evil associates to have devotion to this profound perfection of wisdom.”

26.27 “Blessed Lord, how profound is that perfection of wisdom, for which it is difficult to have devotion in that manner?”

26.28 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “physical forms are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in physical forms the absence of inherent existence is still physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in consciousness [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still consciousness [and so forth]. Subhūti, the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, in the links of dependent origination [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the links of dependent origination [and so forth].

26.29 “Subhūti, the perfection of generosity is neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the perfection of generosity the absence of inherent existence is still the perfection of generosity. Subhūti, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are neither fettered nor liberated. [F.176.a] If you ask why, Subhūti, in the perfection of wisdom [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the perfection of wisdom [and so forth].

26.30 “Subhūti, the emptiness of internal phenomena is neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the emptiness of internal phenomena the absence of inherent existence is still the emptiness of internal phenomena. Subhūti, the emptiness of external phenomena is neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the emptiness of external phenomena the absence of inherent existence is still the emptiness of external phenomena. Subhūti, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena is neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the emptiness of external and internal phenomena the absence of inherent existence is still the emptiness of external and internal phenomena. Subhūti, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth].

26.31 “Subhūti, the four applications of mindfulness are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the four applications of mindfulness the absence of inherent existence is still the four applications of mindfulness. Subhūti, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the noble eightfold path [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the noble eightfold path [and so forth].

26.32 “Subhūti, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the formless absorptions [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the formless absorptions [and so forth]. Subhūti, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, [F.176.b] wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the extrasensory powers [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the extrasensory powers [and so forth]. Subhūti, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. Subhūti, knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, in all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], the absence of inherent existence is still all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

26.33 “Moreover, Subhūti, the past limits of physical forms are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their past limits, though without entity, is still physical forms. Subhūti, the past limits of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their past limits, though without entity, is still consciousness [and so forth]. Subhūti, the past limits [of all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their past limits, though without entity, is still all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

26.34 “Moreover, Subhūti, the future limits of physical forms are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their future limits, though without entity, is still physical forms. Subhūti, the future limits of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their future limits, though without entity, is still consciousness [and so forth]. {Ki.II-III: 155} Subhūti, the future limits [of all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither fettered nor liberated. [F.177.a] If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their future limits, though without entity, is still all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

26.35 “Moreover, Subhūti, the present state of physical forms is neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their present state, though without entity, is still physical forms. Subhūti, the present states of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their present states, though without entity, is still consciousness [and so forth]. Subhūti, the present states [of all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither fettered nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, the inherent existence of their present states, though without entity, is still all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].”

26.36 “Blessed Lord, it is difficult for those who do not persevere, who have not cultivated the roots of virtuous action, who have fallen into the clutches of evil associates, who are under the sway of māras, who are indolent, feeble in perseverance, and forgetful, and who are without alertness to believe in the perfection of wisdom.”

26.37 “Subhūti, so it is!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, it is difficult for those who do not persevere, who have not cultivated the roots of virtuous action, who have fallen into the clutches of evil associates, who are under the sway of māras, who are indolent, feeble in perseverance, and forgetful, and who are without alertness to believe in the perfection of wisdom.

26.38 “Moreover, Subhūti, the purity of physical forms is the purity of fruition. The purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is the purity of fruition. The purity of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination is the purity of fruition. The purity of the perfection of generosity is the purity of fruition. [F.177.b] The purity of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom is the purity of fruition. The purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena is the purity of fruition. The purity of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, is the purity of fruition. The purity of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment is the purity of fruition. The purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions is the purity of fruition. The purity of the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers is the purity of fruition. The purity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways is the purity of fruition. The purity of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is the purity of fruition. The purity of knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience is the purity of fruition.

26.39 “Moreover, Subhūti, the purity of physical forms is the purity of the perfection of wisdom. The purity of the perfection of wisdom is the purity of physical forms. {Ki.II-III: 156} So it is that the purity of physical forms and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.178.a] The purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is the purity of the perfection of wisdom. The purity of the perfection of wisdom is the purity of consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of consciousness [and so forth] and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is the purity of the perfection of wisdom. The purity of the perfection of wisdom is the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.40 “Moreover, Subhūti, the purity of the self is the purity of physical forms. The purity of physical forms is the purity of the self. So it is that the purity of the self and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The purity of the self is the purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. The purity of consciousness [and so forth] is the purity of the self. So it is that the purity of the self and this purity of consciousness [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The purity of the self is the purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. The purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is the purity of the self. So it is that the purity of the self and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.178.b]

26.41 “The purity of sentient beings, life forms, life, living creatures, individuals, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, and viewers is the purity of physical forms. The purity of physical forms is the purity of viewers [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of viewers [and so forth] and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The purity of beings [and so forth], up to and including viewers, is the purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions and consciousness. The purity of consciousness [and so forth] is the purity of viewers [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of viewers [and so forth] and this purity of consciousness [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The purity of beings [and so forth], up to and including viewers, is the purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. The purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is the purity of viewers [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of viewers [and so forth] and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.42 “Moreover, Subhūti, physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the self, and the self is pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the self and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are pure owing to the purity of the self, and the self is pure owing to the purity of consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the self and this purity of consciousness [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.179.a] [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of the self, and the self is pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the self and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.43 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of beings [and so forth], up to and including viewers; viewers [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of viewers [and so forth] and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of beings [and so forth], up to and including viewers; viewers [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of viewers [and so forth] and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.44 “Moreover, Subhūti, physical forms are pure owing to the purity of desire, and desire is pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of desire and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of desire, and desire is pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of desire and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.45 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of hatred, and hatred is pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of hatred and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.179.b] [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of hatred, and hatred is pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of hatred and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.46 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of delusion, and delusion is pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of delusion and this purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of delusion, and delusion is pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of delusion and this purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.47 “Moreover, Subhūti, physical forms are utterly pure owing to the utter purity of desire, and desire is utterly pure owing to the utter purity of physical forms. So it is that the utter purity of desire and this utter purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are utterly pure owing to the utter purity of desire, and desire is pure owing to the utter purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the utter purity of desire and this utter purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.48 “Physical forms are utterly pure owing to the utter purity of hatred, and hatred is utterly pure owing to the utter purity of physical forms. So it is that the utter purity of hatred and this utter purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.180.a] [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are utterly pure owing to the utter purity of hatred, and hatred is utterly pure owing to the utter purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the utter purity of hatred and this utter purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.49 “Physical forms are utterly pure owing to the utter purity of delusion, and delusion is utterly pure owing to the utter purity of physical forms. So it is that the utter purity of delusion and this utter purity of physical forms are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are utterly pure owing to the utter purity of delusion, and delusion is utterly pure owing to the utter purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is that the utter purity of delusion and this utter purity of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. {Ki.II-III: 157}

26.50 “Moreover, Subhūti, formative predispositions are pure owing to the purity of ignorance, and ignorance is pure owing to the purity of formative predispositions. So it is that the purity of ignorance and this purity of formative predispositions are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. Consciousness is pure owing to the purity of formative predispositions. Name and form are pure owing to the purity of consciousness. The six sense fields are pure owing to the purity of name and form. Sensory contact is pure owing to the purity of the six sense fields. Sensation is pure owing to the purity of sensory contact. Craving is pure owing to the purity of sensation. Grasping is pure owing to the purity of craving. The rebirth process is pure owing to the purity of grasping. Actual birth is pure owing to the purity of the rebirth process. Aging and death are pure owing to the purity of actual birth. [And in reverse], actual birth is pure owing to the purity of aging and death [and so forth]. [F.180.b] So it is that the purity of actual birth [and so forth] and this purity of aging and death [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.51 “The perfection of wisdom is pure owing to the purity of aging and death. Aging and death are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. So it is that the purity of aging and death and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The perfection of meditative concentration is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. The perfection of perseverance is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of meditative concentration. The perfection of tolerance is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of perseverance. The perfection of ethical discipline is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of tolerance. The perfection of generosity is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of ethical discipline. [And in reverse], the perfection of ethical discipline is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth] and this purity of the perfection of ethical discipline [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.52 “The emptiness of internal phenomena is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity, and the perfection of generosity is pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth] and this purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. The emptiness of external phenomena is pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. The emptiness of external and internal phenomena is pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of external phenomena. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of external and internal phenomena [and so forth]. [F.181.a] [And in reverse], the emptiness of the essential nature is pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. So it is that the purity of the emptiness of the essential nature and this purity of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.53 “The applications of mindfulness are pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. The emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities is pure owing to the purity of the applications of mindfulness. So it is that the purity of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities and this purity of the applications of mindfulness are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.54 “The correct exertions are pure owing to the purity of the applications of mindfulness. The supports for miraculous ability are pure owing to the purity of the correct exertions. The faculties are pure owing to the purity of the supports for miraculous ability. The powers are pure owing to the purity of the faculties. The branches of enlightenment are pure owing to the purity of the powers. The path is pure owing to the purity of the branches of enlightenment. [And in reverse], the branches of enlightenment are pure owing to the purity of the path. So it is that the purity of the branches of enlightenment and this purity of the path are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.55 “The truths of the noble ones are pure owing to the purity of the path. The meditative concentrations are pure owing to the purity of the truths of the noble ones. The immeasurable attitudes are pure owing to the purity of the meditative concentrations. The formless absorptions are pure owing to the purity of the immeasurable attitudes. The eight aspects of liberation are pure owing to the purity of the formless absorptions. [F.181.b] The nine serial steps of meditative absorption are pure owing to the purity of the eight aspects of liberation. Emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness are pure owing to the purity of the serial steps of meditative absorption. The extrasensory powers are pure owing to the purity of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. The meditative stabilities are pure owing to the purity of the extrasensory powers. The dhāraṇī gateways are pure owing to the purity of the meditative stabilities. The powers of the tathāgatas are pure owing to the purity of the dhāraṇī gateways. The fearlessnesses are pure owing to the purity of the powers of the tathāgatas. The kinds of exact knowledge are pure owing to the purity of the fearlessnesses. The distinct qualities of the buddhas are pure owing to the purity of the kinds of exact knowledge. Knowledge of all the dharmas is pure owing to the purity of the distinct qualities of the buddhas. {Ki.II-III: 158} Knowledge of the path is pure owing to the purity of knowledge of all the dharmas. All-aspect omniscience is pure owing to the purity of knowledge of the path. [And in reverse], knowledge of the path is pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. So it is that the purity of knowledge of the path and this purity of all-aspect omniscience are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.56 “Moreover, Subhūti, physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.182.a]

26.57 “Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of consciousness [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.58 “The eyes are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of the eyes. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of the eyes, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.59 “The ears, nose, tongue, body, and mental faculty are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of the mental faculty [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of the mental faculty [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.60 “Sights are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of sights. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of sights, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.61 “Sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of mental phenomena [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of mental phenomena [F.182.b] [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.62 “Visual consciousness is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of visual consciousness. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of visual consciousness, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.63 “Auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, and mental consciousness are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of mental consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of mental consciousness [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.64 “Visually compounded sensory contact is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of visually compounded sensory contact. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of visually compounded sensory contact, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.65 “Aurally compounded sensory contact, nasally compounded sensory contact, lingually compounded sensory contact, corporeally compounded sensory contact, and mentally compounded sensory contact are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. [F.183.a] So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.66 “Feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.67 “Feelings conditioned by aurally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by nasally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by lingually compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by corporeally compounded sensory contact, and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of wisdom. [All phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of wisdom, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.68 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of physical forms, [F.183.b] and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.69 “Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of consciousness [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.70 “The eyes are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of the eyes. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of the eyes, and this purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.71 “The ears, nose, tongue, body, and mental faculty are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of the mental faculty [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of the mental faculty [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.72 “Sights are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of sights. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of sights, and this purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.73 “Sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of mental phenomena [and so forth]. [F.184.a] So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of mental phenomena [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.74 “Visual consciousness is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of visual consciousness. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of visual consciousness, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.75 “Auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, and mental consciousness are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of mental consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of mental consciousness [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.76 “Visually compounded sensory contact is pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of visually compounded sensory contact. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of visually compounded sensory contact, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.77 “Aurally compounded sensory contact, nasally compounded sensory contact, lingually compounded sensory contact, corporeally compounded sensory contact, and [F.184.b] mentally compounded sensory contact are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.79 “Feelings conditioned by aurally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by nasally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by lingually compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by corporeally compounded sensory contact, and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact are pure owing to the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth], the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.80 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena, the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, [F.185.a] and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.81 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth], the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth], the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.82 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the applications of mindfulness. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the applications of mindfulness, the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of the applications of mindfulness. [F.185.b] All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the applications of mindfulness, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.83 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the noble eightfold path [and so forth], the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the noble eightfold path [and so forth], the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.84 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, [F.186.a] and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.85 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [B39]

26.86 “[All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. [F.186.b] All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.87 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of individual enlightenment [and so forth], the purity of physical forms, and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of individual enlightenment [and so forth], the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.88 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of knowledge of the path. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of knowledge of the path, the purity of physical forms, and this purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.187.a] [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of knowledge of the path. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of knowledge of the path, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity [of all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.89 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of physical forms, and this purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity of [all phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.90 “Moreover, Subhūti, physical forms are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. The perfection of wisdom is pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of physical forms, and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. [F.187.b] Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. The perfection of wisdom is pure owing to the purity of consciousness [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of consciousness [and so forth], and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

26.91 “[All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. The perfection of wisdom is pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity of the perfection of wisdom are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

- 26.92 “Physical forms are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are pure owing to the purity of physical forms. So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of physical forms, and this purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.
- 26.93 “[All phenomena], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact, are pure owing to the purity of all-aspect omniscience. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are pure owing to the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. [F.188.a] So it is that the purity of all-aspect omniscience, the purity of feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and this purity of the perfection of generosity [and so forth] are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.
- 26.94 “Moreover, Subhūti, unconditioned phenomena are pure owing to the purity of conditioned phenomena. [Conditioned phenomena are pure owing to the purity of unconditioned phenomena].⁴⁰¹ So it is that the purity of conditioned phenomena and this purity of unconditioned phenomena are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished. {Ki.II-III: 159}
- 26.95 “Moreover, Subhūti, the future and the present are pure owing to the purity of the past. So it is that the purity of the past, the purity of the future, and the purity of the present are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.
- 26.96 “The past and the present are pure owing to the purity of the future. So it is that the purity of the future, and the purity of the past and the present, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.
- 26.97 “The past and the future are pure owing to the purity of the present. So it is that the purity of the present, and the purity of the past and the future, are not two things, they cannot be divided into two, and they cannot be differentiated or distinguished.

CHAPTER 27: THE PURITY OF ALL THE DHARMAS

27.1 Thereupon the venerable Śāradvatīputra said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this purity is profound.”

“That is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.

27.2 “Due to the absolute purity of what is it that purity is profound?”

“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, [F.188.b] “purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of physical forms. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the eyes. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the ears, nose, tongue, body, and mental faculty. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of sights. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of visual consciousness. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, and mental consciousness. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of visually compounded sensory contact. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of aurally compounded sensory contact, nasally compounded sensory contact, lingually compounded sensory contact, corporeally compounded sensory contact, and mentally compounded sensory contact. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of feelings conditioned by aurally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by nasally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by lingually compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by corporeally compounded sensory contact, and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the earth element. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of ignorance. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, [F.189.a] sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, and aging and death. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the perfection of generosity. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the applications of mindfulness. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. Purity is profound due to the [absolute] purity of knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience.”

27.3 Śāradvatīputra then said, “Blessed Lord, purity is illuminating.”

“That is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.

27.4 “Due to the [absolute] purity of what is it that purity is illuminating?” asked Śāradvatīputra. [F.189.b]

“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of physical forms. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the eyes. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the ears, nose, tongue, body, and mental faculty. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of sights. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of visual consciousness. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, and mental consciousness. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of visually compounded sensory contact. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of aurally compounded sensory contact, nasally compounded sensory contact, lingually compounded sensory contact, corporeally compounded sensory contact, and mentally compounded sensory contact. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of feelings conditioned by aurally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by nasally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by lingually compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by corporeally compounded sensory contact, and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the earth element. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element. [F.190.a] Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of ignorance. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, and aging and death. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the perfection of wisdom. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the applications of mindfulness. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, {Ki.II-III: 160} the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Purity is illuminating due to the [absolute] purity of knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, [F.190.b] and all-aspect omniscience.”

- “That is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.6 “Blessed Lord, due to what not having rebirth is not having rebirth purity?” asked Śāradvatīputra.
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “due to physical forms not passing away and not having rebirth this is purity. Due to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness not passing away and not having rebirth this is purity. Due to [all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, not passing away and not having rebirth this is purity.”
- 27.7 “Blessed Lord, purity is not having affliction.”
- “That is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.8 “Blessed Lord, due to what not having affliction is purity not having affliction?”
- The Blessed One replied, “It is due to the natural luminosity of physical forms that purity is not having affliction. It is due to the natural luminosity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that purity is not having affliction. It is due to the natural luminosity [of all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that purity is not having affliction.”
- 27.9 “Blessed Lord, purity is neither attained nor is it manifestly realized.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.10 “Blessed Lord, pertaining to what is purity neither attained nor manifestly realized?” [F.191.a]
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity pertains to physical forms that are neither attained nor manifestly realized. Purity pertains to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that are neither attained nor manifestly realized. Purity pertains [to all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that are neither attained nor manifestly realized.”
- 27.11 “Blessed Lord, purity has not been brought into being.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.12 “Blessed Lord, regarding what has purity not been brought into being?”
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity regards the not being brought into being of physical forms. Purity regards the not being brought into being of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Purity regards the not being brought into being [of all other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”
- 27.13 “Blessed Lord, purity is not subject to rebirth in the realm of desire.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.14 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not subject to rebirth in the realm of desire?”

- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity is not subject to rebirth because the realm of desire is naturally nonapprehensible.” {Ki.II-III: 161}
- 27.15 “Blessed Lord, purity is not subject to rebirth in the realm of form.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.16 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not subject to rebirth in the realm of form?”
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity is not subject to rebirth because the realm of form is naturally nonapprehensible.”
- 27.17 “Blessed Lord, purity [F.191.b] is not subject to rebirth in the realm of formlessness.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.18 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not subject to rebirth in the realm of formlessness?”
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity is not subject to rebirth because the realm of formlessness is naturally nonapprehensible.”
- 27.19 “Blessed Lord, purity is not cognizant.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.20 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not cognizant?”
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity is not cognizant due to the inanimate nature of phenomena.”
- 27.21 “Blessed Lord, purity is not cognizant of physical forms.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.22 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not cognizant of physical forms?”
- “Purity is not cognizant of physical forms owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.23 “Blessed Lord, purity is not cognizant of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.24 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not cognizant of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness?”
- “Purity is not cognizant of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.25 “Blessed Lord, purity is not cognizant of anything.” [F.192.a]
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.26 “Blessed Lord, how is purity not cognizant of anything?”
- “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “purity is not cognizant of anything owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics.”
- 27.27 “Blessed Lord! The perfection of wisdom neither helps nor hinders all-aspect omniscience.”
- “Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.

- 27.28 “Blessed Lord, how does the perfection of wisdom neither help nor hinder all-aspect omniscience?” {Ki.II-III: 162}
“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom neither helps nor hinders all-aspect omniscience owing to the presence of reality’s expanse.”
- 27.29 “Blessed Lord, the purity of the perfection of wisdom does not appropriate anything at all.”
“Śāradvatīputra, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.30 “Blessed Lord, how does the purity of the perfection of wisdom not appropriate anything at all?”
“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “the purity of the perfection of wisdom does not appropriate anything at all because reality’s expanse is unmoving.”
- 27.31 Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, the purity of physical forms is due to the purity of the self.”
“Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.32 “Blessed Lord, why is the purity of physical forms due to the purity of the self?”
“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, [F.192.b] “that is due to absolute purity. Absolute purity denotes that physical forms are nonexistent, owing to the nonexistence of the self.”
- 27.33 “Blessed Lord, the purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is due to the purity of the self.”
“Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.34 “Blessed Lord, why is the purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness due to the purity of the self?”
“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “that is due to absolute purity. Absolute purity denotes that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are nonexistent, owing to the nonexistence of the self.”
- 27.35 “Blessed Lord, the purity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is due to the purity of the self.”
“Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.36 “Blessed Lord, why is the purity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination due to the purity of the self?”

27.37 “Blessed Lord, the purity of the perfection of generosity is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the emptiness of internal phenomena is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, is due to the purity of the self. [F.193.a] Blessed Lord, the purity of the applications of mindfulness is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, and the kinds of exact knowledge is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is due to the purity of the self.”

27.38 “Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.II-III: 163}

27.39 “Blessed Lord, why is the purity of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] due to the purity of the self?”

27.40 “Blessed Lord, the purity of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth is due to the purity of the self. [F.193.b] Blessed Lord, the purity of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of arhatship is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of individual enlightenment is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of enlightenment is due to the purity of the self.”

“Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.

27.41 “Blessed Lord, why is the purity of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa due to the purity of the self? Why is the purity of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth due to the purity of the self? Why is the purity of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth due to the purity of the self? Why is the purity of arhatship and individual enlightenment due to the purity of the self?"

"That is owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics," replied the Blessed One.

27.42 "Blessed Lord, the purity of knowledge of the path is due to the purity of the self. Blessed Lord, the purity of all-aspect omniscience is due to the purity of the self."

"Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity," replied the Blessed One.

27.43 "Blessed Lord, why is the purity of knowledge of the path due to the purity of the self? Why is the purity of all-aspect omniscience due to the purity of the self?"

"That is owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics," replied the Blessed One.

27.44 "Blessed Lord, nonduality and purity are neither to be attained nor clearly realized."

"Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity," replied the Blessed One.

27.45 "Blessed Lord, why are nonduality and purity neither to be attained nor clearly realized?" [F.194.a]

"That is because there is neither affliction nor purification," replied the Blessed One.

27.46 "Blessed Lord, the limitlessness of physical forms is due to the limitlessness of the self."

"Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity," replied the Blessed One.

27.47 "Blessed Lord, why is the purity of the limitlessness of physical forms due to the limitlessness of the self?"

"That is due to the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end," replied the Blessed One.

27.48 "Blessed Lord, the limitlessness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is due to the limitlessness of the self."

"Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity," replied the Blessed One.

27.49 "Blessed Lord, why is the purity of the limitlessness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness due to the limitlessness of the self?"

"That is due to the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end," replied the Blessed One.

27.50 "Blessed Lord, the limitlessness of [other phenomena, attributes, and attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is due to the limitlessness of the self."

"Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity," replied the Blessed One.

- 27.51 “Blessed Lord, why is the purity of the limitlessness of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] due to the limitlessness of the self?”
 “That is due to the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.52 “Blessed Lord, it is the perfection of wisdom of the bodhisattva great beings through which this is realized.”
 “Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.II-III: 164}
- 27.53 “Blessed Lord, [F.194.b] why is it the perfection of wisdom of the bodhisattva great beings through which this is realized?”
 “Subhūti, it is so owing to knowledge of the path,”⁴⁰² replied the Blessed One. {Ki.II-III: 165}
- 27.54 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not dwell on the near shore, the far shore, or the midstream between these two, this denotes the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have.”
 “Subhūti, that is due to absolute purity,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.55 “Blessed Lord, why is it that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not dwell on the near shore, the far shore, or the midstream between these two, and are [therefore] absolutely pure?”
 “Subhūti, this is owing to the sameness of the three times,” replied the Blessed One.
- 27.56 “Blessed Lord, noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas but lack skillful means will perceive this perfection of wisdom by way of apprehending; they will undervalue the perfection of wisdom and abandon the perfection of wisdom.”
 “Subhūti, it is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Excellent, Subhūti, excellent! Subhūti, this indeed denotes attachment to names and attachment to signs!”
- 27.57 “Blessed Lord, how does this denote attachment to names and attachment to signs?”
 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas grasp the perfection of wisdom as a name or grasp it as a sign, then, in grasping the perfection of wisdom as a name or as a sign, they will be attached to the perfection of wisdom, for which reason [F.195.a] they will undervalue the perfection of wisdom and abandon the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas grasp the perfection of wisdom as a sign, and, having grasped it as a sign, give rise to conceits on the basis of the perfection of wisdom, then, in making assumptions on the basis of the perfection of wisdom, they will be attached to the perfection of wisdom, for which reason they will undervalue the perfection of wisdom and abandon the perfection of wisdom.”

27.58 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, how wonderful it is that this perfection of wisdom has been eloquently explained and excellently revealed in that manner to bodhisattva great beings, and that they are neither attached nor unattached to it!” {Ki.II-III: 166}

27.59 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the venerable Subhūti, “Venerable Subhūti, what is the attachment that bodhisattva great beings might have and what is their nonattachment?”

“Venerable Śāradvatīputra,” replied Subhūti, “if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, lacking in skillful means, perceive that physical forms are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the perfection of generosity is empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the emptiness of internal phenomena is empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are empty, then they are attached. [F.195.b] If they perceive that the applications of mindfulness are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the truths of the noble ones are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty, then they are attached. If they perceive that [the attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty, then they are attached.

- 27.60 “Moreover, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, lacking in skillful means, perceive that phenomena of the past are phenomena of the past, then they are attached. If they perceive that phenomena of the future are phenomena of the future, then they are attached. If they perceive that phenomena of the present are phenomena of the present, then they are attached.
- 27.61 “Moreover, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas practice the perfection of generosity by way of apprehending, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, then they are attached; and if they practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached.
- 27.62 “If they practice the emptiness of internal phenomena [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. [F.196.a] If they practice [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the applications of mindfulness [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the truths of the noble ones [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the truths of the noble ones [in apprehending that manner], then they are attached. If they practice the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, {Ki.II-III: 167} and the extrasensory powers [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached. If they practice [the attainments], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, [in that apprehending manner], then they are attached.
- 27.63 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, you also asked, ‘What is the nonattachment of bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom?’ Venerable Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings, skilled in means, who practice the perfection of wisdom, do not perceive that physical forms are physical forms. They do not perceive that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are consciousness [and so forth]. They do not perceive that phenomena of the past are phenomena of the past. They do not perceive that phenomena of the future are phenomena of the future. They do not perceive that phenomena of the present are phenomena of the present.

27.64 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings, skilled in means, who practice the perfection of wisdom, [F.196.b] do not think, ‘I should give a gift! I should give this sort of gift to that person!’; or ‘I should maintain ethical discipline! I should maintain this sort of ethical discipline!’; or ‘I should cultivate tolerance! I should cultivate this sort of tolerance!’; or ‘I should undertake perseverance! I should undertake this sort of perseverance!’; or ‘I should be absorbed in meditative concentration! I should be absorbed in this sort of meditative concentration!’; or ‘I should cultivate wisdom! I should cultivate this sort of wisdom!’; or ‘I should generate merit! I should generate this sort of merit! I should generate this much merit!’; or ‘I should enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. I should purify the buddhafi elds!’; or ‘I should attain all-aspect omniscience!’

27.65 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, for bodhisattva great beings, skilled in means, who practice the perfection of wisdom, all such conceptual thoughts are nonexistent and will not come about owing to the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, the emptiness of emptiness, the emptiness of great extent, the emptiness of ultimate reality, the emptiness of conditioned phenomena, the emptiness of unconditioned phenomena, the emptiness of that which is beyond extremes, the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end, the emptiness of nonexclusion, the emptiness of inherent existence, the emptiness of all phenomena, the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics, the emptiness of nonapprehensibility, the emptiness of nonentities, the emptiness of essential nature, and the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities.

27.66 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, [F.197.a] these are indicative of the nonattachment of bodhisattva great beings, skilled in means, who practice the perfection of wisdom.”

27.67 Thereupon Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, asked the venerable Subhūti, “Blessed Subhūti, how can one say that noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas would be attached?”

27.68 The venerable Subhūti replied to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, “Kauśika, when noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas perceive thoughts; perceive the perfection of generosity; perceive the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; and when they perceive the emptiness of internal phenomena, perceive the emptiness of external phenomena, perceive the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and perceive [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; when they perceive the four applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; when they perceive the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; when they perceive the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers; when they perceive the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways; when they perceive the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct attributes of the buddhas; when they perceive the transcendent lord buddhas; [F.197.b] and when they perceive the virtuous actions that give rise to buddhahood, and then amassing all these roots of virtuous action, assimilate them and dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, while still perceiving that they are making this dedication—Kauśika, all these perceptions are indicative of the attachment that noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas might have. When they are involved with such modes of attachment, they cannot practice the perfection of wisdom, which is without attachment. If you ask why, Kauśika, they are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of physical forms, and they are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the perfections. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of all the aspects of emptiness. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, {Ki.II-III: 168} the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. They are incapable of dedicating the intrinsic nature of knowledge of the path and of all-aspect omniscience.

27.69 “Moreover Kauśika, [F.198.a] when bodhisattva great beings instruct others in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, encouraging them, filling them with enthusiasm, and causing them to rejoice, they should instruct and encourage them, filling them with enthusiasm, and causing them to rejoice, with a mind that is in conformity with reality.

27.70 “Also, when practicing the perfection of generosity by whatever means, they will not think, ‘I am practicing the perfection of generosity.’ They will not think, ‘I am practicing the perfection of ethical discipline. I am practicing the perfection of tolerance. I am practicing the perfection of perseverance. I am practicing the perfection of meditative concentration. I am practicing the perfection of wisdom.’ They will not think, ‘I am practicing the emptiness of internal phenomena. I am practicing the emptiness of external phenomena. I am practicing the emptiness of external and internal phenomena. I am practicing [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. I am practicing the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. I am practicing the truths of the noble ones. I am practicing the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. I am practicing the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. I am practicing the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. I am practicing the powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.’ They will not think, ‘I am practicing all-aspect omniscience.’ [F.198.b] It is in that manner that they should instruct and encourage others, filling them with enthusiasm and causing them to rejoice. Noble sons or noble daughters who practice in that manner should instruct and encourage others in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, filling them with enthusiasm and causing them to rejoice. When those who would instruct and encourage others, filling them with enthusiasm and causing them to rejoice, actually do so, they will not degenerate [in their commitments], and this will encourage the buddhas to accept them. {Ki.II-III: 169} Noble sons or noble daughters who act in that manner will renounce all the limits of attachment.”

27.71 Thereupon, the Blessed One addressed the venerable Subhūti: “Subhūti, well said! Subhūti, it is excellent that you are teaching those points concerning attachment. Excellent! Subhūti, for this reason I will also explain to you more subtle modes of attachment than these. Listen well, be attentive, and I will teach them!"

27.72 "Blessed Lord, may it be so!" he replied. Then the venerable Subhūti listened to the Blessed One, as the Blessed One said, "Subhūti, when noble sons or noble daughters who have entered upon unsurpassed, complete enlightenment focus their attention on the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas in terms of conceptual images or signs, Subhūti, to whatever extent they resort to conceptual images or signs, to that extent there would be attachment. [F.199.a] When in terms of conceptual images or signs they focus their attention on all the roots of virtue possessed by past, present, and future tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are free from all attachments, in the interval extending from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until their establishing of the Dharma, and having focused their attention on them [in that manner], dedicate their merit to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, Subhūti, to whatever extent they focus their attention on them in terms of conceptual images or signs, to that extent there would be attachment.

27.73 "Similarly, when in terms of conceptual images or signs they focus their attention on all the roots of virtue possessed by the śrāvakas of those tathāgatas and other beings apart from them, and dedicate these to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, Subhūti, to whatever extent they focus their attention in terms of conceptual images or signs, to that extent there would be attachment. If you ask why, it is because they should not focus their attention on the tathāgatas in terms of conceptual images or signs, and they should not focus their attention even on the roots of virtue possessed by the tathāgatas in terms of conceptual images or signs."

27.74 Then Subhūti said, "Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is profound."

"Subhūti, that is because all phenomena are naturally void," replied the Blessed One.

27.75 "Blessed Lord, I pay homage to the perfection of wisdom!"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "so it is that the perfection of wisdom is unfabricated and unconditioned. With regard to it, there is no one at all who can attain consummate buddhahood."

27.76 "Blessed Lord, there are none at all who will attain consummate buddhahood."

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "so it is that the nature of phenomena is without duality. The nature of phenomena is exclusively singular. Subhūti, {Ki.II-III: 170} this singular nature of phenomena is without inherent existence. Subhūti, that which is without inherent existence is unfabricated. That which is unfabricated is unconditioned. Subhūti, so it is that when bodhisattva great beings know that the singular nature of phenomena [F.199.b] without inherent existence is unfabricated and unconditioned, they abandon all modes of attachment.”

27.77 “Blessed Lord! The perfection of wisdom is hard to realize.”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this is because the perfection of wisdom has not been seen, realized, cognized, or acquired in manifest buddhahood by anyone at all.”

27.78 “Blessed Lord! The perfection of wisdom is inconceivable.”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this is because it has not been known by the mind, and it has not been known by physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. It has not been known by the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. It has not been known by the perfections, the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions. It has not been known by the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers. It has not been known by the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways. It has not been known by the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. It has not been known by the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment. It has not been known by knowledge of the path or all-aspect omniscience.”

27.79 This completes the twenty-seventh chapter, “The Purity of All the Dharmas,” from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 28

- 28.1 Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, [F.200.a] “Blessed Lord! The perfection of wisdom is inactive.”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “that is because agents are nonapprehensible. Similarly, Subhūti, it is because physical forms are nonapprehensible, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are nonapprehensible, and [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are nonapprehensible.”

- 28.2 “Blessed Lord! How then should bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “in this regard, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not engage with physical forms, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, [F.200.b] then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, or all-aspect omniscience, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. {Ki.II-III: 171}

28.3 “If they do not engage with the notions that physical forms are permanent or impermanent, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are permanent or impermanent, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that [all phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are permanent or impermanent, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.

28.4 “If they do not engage with the notions that physical forms are imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that [all phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.

28.5 “If they do not engage with the notions that physical forms constitute a self or a nonself, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness constitute a self or a nonself, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that [all phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, constitute a self or a nonself, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.

28.6 “If they do not engage with the notions that physical forms are pleasant or unpleasant, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are pleasant or unpleasant, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that [all phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are pleasant or unpleasant, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. [F.201.a] If you ask why, that which is permanent or impermanent, that which is imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, that which constitutes a self or a nonself, and that which is pleasant or unpleasant is not physical forms. That which is permanent or impermanent, that which is imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, that which constitutes a self or a nonself, and that which is pleasant or unpleasant is not feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. That which is permanent or impermanent, that which is imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, that which constitutes a self or a nonself, and that which is pleasant or unpleasant is not [all phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. [B40]

28.7 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not engage with the notion that physical forms are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that {Ki.II-III: 172} all the perfections and all the aspects of emptiness are unperfected, then then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the applications of mindfulness are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.201.b] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are unperfected, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.

28.8 “Why so, you may ask? If indeed they do not engage in that manner with the notion that unperfected physical forms are not physical forms, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If indeed they do not engage in that manner with the notion that unperfected feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not consciousness [and so forth], then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If indeed they do not engage in that manner with the notion that unperfected [phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.”

28.9 “Blessed Lord, how wonderful it is that this exegesis on the attachment and nonattachment possessed by noble sons and noble daughters who espouse the vehicle of the bodhisattvas has been eloquently explained by the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha!”

28.10 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “The attachment and nonattachment possessed by noble sons and noble daughters who espouse the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have been eloquently explained by the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha. [F.202.a]

28.11 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not engage with the notions that physical forms are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the perfection of generosity is with attachment, or that it is without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the emptiness of internal phenomena is with attachment, or that it is without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, [F.202.b] then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are with attachment, or that they are without attachment, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. {Ki.II-III: 173}

- 28.12 “Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice in that manner, they do not perceive that physical forms are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, [F.203.a] the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is with attachment, or that it is without attachment. They do not perceive that the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship are with attachment, or that they are without attachment. They do not perceive that individual enlightenment is with attachment, or that it is without attachment. They do not perceive that unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is with attachment, or that it is without attachment.”

- 28.13 “Blessed Lord, how most wonderful it is that this profound Dharma is neither diminished when it is explained, nor is it diminished even when it is not explained. It is neither enhanced when it is explained, nor is it enhanced even when it is not explained!”
- 28.14 “It is so, Subhūti! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “This profound Dharma is neither diminished when it is explained, nor is it diminished even when it is not explained. It is neither enhanced when it is explained, nor is it enhanced even when it is not explained. Subhūti, this is just as if the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas were to eulogize or not eulogize space for the duration of their entire lives. Space would neither be enhanced when it is eulogized, nor would it be diminished when it is disparaged. Space does not become attached even when it is eulogized, and space does not become annoyed even when it is disparaged. Subhūti, just as an illusory man is neither enhanced when eulogized, nor diminished when disparaged, in the same way, Subhūti, the reality of phenomena is such even when it is explained, and it is such even when it is not explained.” [F.203.b]
- 28.15 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and teach the perfection of wisdom, they are neither disheartened nor distracted. Persevering in this perfection of wisdom, they do not turn away from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but achieve that which is difficult. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom by bodhisattva great beings is like cultivating space. That is to say, in space, physical forms are not discerned; nor are feelings, perceptions, {Ki.II-III: 174} formative predispositions, and consciousness discerned. In space, the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are not discerned. In space, the perfection of generosity is not discerned; nor are the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom discerned. In space, the emptiness of internal phenomena is not discerned; nor are [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, discerned. In space, the applications of mindfulness are not discerned; nor are the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path discerned. In space, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are not discerned. In space, [F.204.a] the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are not discerned. In space, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are not discerned. In space, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is not discerned; nor are the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment discerned. In space, unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is not discerned.

28.16 “Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who would don this armor are worthy of homage! Blessed Lord, those who would don this armor intend to strive, intend to struggle, and intend to make efforts for the sake of space. Blessed Lord, those who would don this armor for the sake of beings are seeking to mature and seeking to liberate space. Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who would don this armor for the sake of phenomena that resemble space don the mighty armor. Blessed Lord, those who would don this armor for the sake of beings are seeking to buttress the sky. Those bodhisattva great beings who would enter into unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of beings acquire great perseverance. Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who would enter into unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of beings don the mighty armor. Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who would attain consummate buddhahood—unsurpassed, complete enlightenment—for [F.204.b] the sake of phenomena that resemble space don a mighty armor that is heroic, inconceivable, and unequalled.

28.17 “If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, if this world system of the great trichiliocosm were completely filled with manifold tathāgatas, like a bed of reeds, a grove of canes, a grove of sugarcane, a grove of bamboo, a paddy field, or a field of sesame, and if these tathāgatas were to teach the Dharma for an eon or more than an eon, even though each of these tathāgatas might establish inestimable, countless beings in final nirvāṇa, Blessed Lord, the depletion or replenishment of the world of beings would not be discernible. If one were to ask why, it is because beings are nonexistent and because beings are void. Similarly, if the fields in each of the world systems of the ten directions, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, were completely filled with manifold tathāgatas, {Ki.II-III: 175} like a bed of reeds, a grove of canes, a grove of sugarcane, a grove of bamboo, a paddy field, or a field of sesame, and if these tathāgatas were to teach the Dharma for an eon or more than an eon, even though each of these tathāgatas might establish inestimable, countless beings in final nirvāṇa, Blessed Lord, the depletion or replenishment of the world of beings would not be discernible. If one were to ask why, it is because beings are nonexistent and because beings are void. Blessed Lord, those are the formulations explaining how I say that those who seek to attain consummate buddhahood—unsurpassed, complete enlightenment—for the sake of beings, are actually seeking to mature and liberate space.”

28.18 At that time there was a certain monk [present within the assembly] [F.205.a] who thought, “I pay homage to the blessed lady, the perfection of wisdom, in whom, although nothing at all arises or ceases, the aggregate of ethical discipline is still discerned, the aggregate of meditative stability is still discerned, the aggregate of wisdom is still discerned, the aggregate of liberation is still discerned, and the aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation is still discerned; the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is still discerned; the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment are still discerned; unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is still discerned; those entering the stream to nirvāṇa are still discerned; those destined for only one more rebirth, those no longer subject to rebirth, arhats, and pratyekabuddhas are still discerned; the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are still discerned—and in whom the precious jewel of the Buddha, the precious jewel of the Dharma, and the precious jewel of the Saṅgha are still discerned, and in whom the turnings of the wheel of the Dharma are still discerned!”⁴⁰³

28.19 Thereupon, Śakra, mighty king of the gods, asked the venerable Subhūti, “Blessed Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings persevere with this profound perfection of wisdom, with respect to what are they persevering?”

“Kauśika,” replied Subhūti, “the mind that would train in this perfection of wisdom perseveres with respect to empty space.”

28.20 Śakra, mighty king of the gods, then said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, I will guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to those noble sons or noble daughters who take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom. Permit me to do so, Blessed Lord!”

28.21 Then the venerable Subhūti [F.205.b] addressed Śakra, mighty king of the gods, “Kauśika, do you observe anything that should be guarded, protected, and offered sanctuary?”

“Blessed Subhūti, I do not observe anything that should be guarded, protected, and offered sanctuary,” he replied.

28.22 “Kauśika, if noble sons or noble daughters dwell in this perfection of wisdom, as it has been described, that itself will guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to them. {Ki.II-III: 176} If they are separated from this perfection of wisdom, as it has been described, human and nonhuman adversaries who wish to harm them will find an opportunity to do so. One should know that those noble sons or noble daughters who do not dwell in the perfection of wisdom, as it has been described, will be separated from the perfection of wisdom.

28.23 “Kauśika, anyone thinking to guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom would actually be thinking to guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to space. They would not succeed and would tire themselves out!

28.24 “Kauśika, do you think that you can guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to a magical display, a mirage, a dream, an echo, an optical illusion, or a phantom?”

“No, Blessed Subhūti!” he replied.

28.25 “Kauśika, in the same way, anyone thinking to guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom would not succeed and would tire themselves out!

28.26 “Kauśika, do you think you can guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to the tathāgatas or to an emanation of the tathāgatas?” [F.206.a]

“No, Blessed Subhūti!” Śakra replied.

28.27 “Kauśika, in the same way, anyone thinking to guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom would not succeed and would tire themselves out!

28.28 “Kauśika, do you think you can guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to the realm of phenomena, the very limit of reality, the real nature, or the inconceivable realm?”

“No, Blessed Subhūti!” Śakra replied.

28.29 “Kauśika, in the same way, anyone thinking to guard, protect, and offer sanctuary to bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom would not succeed and would tire themselves out!”

28.30 Then, Śakra, mighty king of the gods, asked the venerable Subhūti, “Blessed Subhūti, to what extent do bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom comprehend that phenomena are like a magical display, a mirage, a dream, an echo, an optical aberration, or a phantom, so that, consequent to this understanding, they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms?”

28.31 “Kauśika,” replied Subhūti, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, {Ki.II-III: 177} if they do not give rise to conceits based on physical forms, do not give rise to conceits on account of physical forms, and do not give rise to conceits about physical forms, [F.206.b] then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.

28.32 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, do not give rise to conceits on account of consciousness [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about consciousness [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.

28.33 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, do not give rise to conceits on account of the links of dependent origination [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about the links of dependent origination [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.

28.34 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, do not give rise to conceits on account of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.

28.35 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, [F.207.a] signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers, do not give rise to conceits on account of the extrasensory powers [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about the extrasensory powers [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their - dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.

- 28.36 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways, do not give rise to conceits on account of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.
- 28.37 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, do not give rise to conceits on account of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.
- 28.38 “If they do not give rise to conceits based on [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do not give rise to conceits on account of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits about all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], then they do not give rise to conceits based on their dreams, do not give rise to conceits on account of their dreams, do not give rise to conceits about their dreams, and so on, up to and including the fact that they do not give rise to conceits based on phantoms, [F.207.b] do not give rise to conceits on account of phantoms, and do not give rise to conceits about phantoms.”
- 28.39 Thereupon, through the power of the Tathāgata, the gods of the Caturmahā-rājakāyika realm, in this world system of the great trichilocosm, along with the gods of the Trayastriṃśa realm, and all the gods of the Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, and Paranirmitavaśavartin realms, of the Brahmakāyika, Brahmapurohita, and Brahmapariṣadya realms, and of all [the other realms], up to and including the Pure Abodes, as many as there are, scattered divine sandalwood powders toward the Blessed One, and then they approached the place where the Blessed One was seated. Prostrating their heads at the feet of the Blessed One, they took their places to one side.

28.40 Then, through the power of the Buddha, those gods of the Caturmahārāja-kāyika realm, Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, Brahmā, lord of the world of Patient Endurance, and all the gods [of the other realms], up to and including the Pure Abodes, beheld with their minds the thousand buddhas of the eastern direction teaching the Dharma through these very syllables, with these very words, while monks named Subhūti exclusively requested this profound perfection of wisdom and [specifically] this very chapter of the perfection of wisdom, and Śakra, mighty king of the gods, then asked questions and counter-questions concerning this specific chapter of the perfection of wisdom.

28.41 Similarly, they beheld with their minds the thousand buddhas of each of the other directions—south, west, north, northeast, southeast, southwest, northwest, nadir, and zenith—teaching the Dharma through these very syllables, with these very words, while monks named Subhūti exclusively requested this profound perfection of wisdom and [specifically] this very chapter of the perfection of wisdom, and Śakra, mighty king of the gods, then asked questions and counter-questions concerning this specific chapter of the perfection of wisdom.

28.42 Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Subhūti: [F.208.a] “Subhūti, once the bodhisattva great being Maitreya has attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, he will teach and explain this very perfection of wisdom in this very place. Once all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas in this Auspicious Eon have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, {Ki.II-III: 178} they will indeed teach and explain this perfection of wisdom in this very place.”

28.43 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, through what modes, through what indications, and through what signs will the bodhisattva great being Maitreya teach and explain this perfection of wisdom, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

28.44 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti as follows: “In this regard, Subhūti, the bodhisattva great being Maitreya, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that physical forms are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that physical forms are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that physical forms constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that physical forms are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that physical forms are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that physical forms are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that physical forms are past, that they are future, or that they are present.

28.45 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are permanent or that they are impermanent. [F.208.b] He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that consciousness [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that consciousness [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that consciousness [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that consciousness [and so forth] are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that consciousness [and so forth] are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that consciousness [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.

28.46 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.

28.47 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are at peace or [F.209.a] that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.

28.48 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the extrasensory powers [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that the extrasensory powers [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that the extrasensory powers [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the extrasensory powers [and so forth] are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the extrasensory powers [and so forth] are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the extrasensory powers [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.

28.49 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are fettered [F.209.b] or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.

- 28.50 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.
- 28.51 “He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are permanent or that they are impermanent. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, according to the notions that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] constitute a self or a nonself, or according to the notions that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are pleasant or unpleasant. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are at peace or that they are not at peace. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are fettered or that they are liberated. He will not teach the Dharma according to the notions that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are past, that they are future, or that they are present.” [F.210.a]
- 28.52 “Blessed Lord, how then will the bodhisattva great being Maitreya teach the Dharma, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed complete enlightenment? What will he teach?”
- 28.53 “He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that physical forms are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are absolutely pure. He will teach the Dharma of absolute purity, in that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely pure.” [F.210.b]

28.54 “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure.” {Ki.II-III: 179}

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of physical forms. The perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. The perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. The perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. The perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. The perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. The perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

28.55 “Blessed Lord, how is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of physical forms? How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? How is the perfection of wisdom [F.211.a] absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination? How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment? How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers? How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways? How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?"

28.56 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "physical forms are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and [F.211.b] they are neither afflicted nor purified. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified. The meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely pure because they neither arise nor cease, and they are neither afflicted nor purified.

28.57 "Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of space."

28.58 "Blessed Lord, how is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the absolute purity of space?" [F.212.a]

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "space is absolutely pure because it neither arises nor ceases, and it is neither afflicted nor purified. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space is unsullied."⁴⁰⁴
{Ki.II-III: 180}

28.59 “Blessed Lord! How is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure owing to the unsullied nature of space?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space cannot be grasped. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space cannot be conventionally designated.”

28.60 “Blessed Lord, how is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure because space cannot be conventionally designated?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space, like the resonance of a double echo in space, cannot be conventionally designated. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space is inexpressible.”

28.61 “Blessed Lord, how is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure because space is inexpressible?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “in space, nothing at all is expressed. In the same way, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space is inexpressible. Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space is nonapprehensible.”

28.62 “Blessed Lord, [F.212.b] how is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure because space is nonapprehensible?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “in space, nothing at all is apprehended. In the same way, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because space is nonapprehensible. Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because all phenomena neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified.”

28.63 “Blessed Lord, how is the perfection of wisdom absolutely pure because all phenomena neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is absolutely pure because all phenomena are utterly pure.” {Ki.II-III: 181}

28.64 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, if any noble sons or noble daughters take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, then, Blessed Lord, they will not suffer ailments of the eyes, nor will they suffer ailments of the ears, ailments of the nose, ailments of the tongue, or ailments of the body, nor will their limbs be defective, nor will their bodies be decrepit due to old age. Nor will those noble sons or noble daughters die a terrible death. Many thousands of gods will purposefully follow them. That is to say, the gods of the Caturmahārājā-kāyika realm and [those of the other realms], up to and including the gods of the Pure Abodes, will purposefully follow them. On the eighth day, the fourteenth day and the fifteenth day [of the lunar month], great hosts of the gods will congregate in places where those noble sons or noble daughters who teach the Dharma, reveal this perfection of wisdom. When those noble sons or noble daughters indeed reveal this perfection of wisdom, [F.213.a] their merit will greatly increase. The stock of merit possessed by those noble sons or noble daughters will increase manifold and to an immeasurable, countless, inconceivable, incomparable, unappraisable, and inestimable extent.”

28.65 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” said the Blessed One. “The merit of those noble sons or noble daughters who reveal this perfection of wisdom on the eighth day, the fourteenth day and the fifteenth day [of the lunar month] before the assembly of gods will increase manifold. Their stock of merit will increase manifold and to an immeasurable, countless, inconceivable, incomparable, unappraisable, and inestimable extent. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because this perfection of wisdom is most precious. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is precious in that it can liberate beings from the hells, and it can liberate them from the birthplaces of animals, the world of Yama, and the impoverished states of human beings and gods. It offers the prospects of rebirth in a great and lofty royal family, or in a great and lofty priestly family, or in a great and lofty householder family; and similarly, it offers the prospect of rebirth among the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm, and it offers the prospects of rebirth among the gods [of other realms], up to and including the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. It offers the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. It offers the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth and the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth. It offers arhatship and individual enlightenment. It offers complete enlightenment.

28.66 “If you ask why, it is because from this perfection of wisdom the paths of the ten virtuous actions is extensively revealed. [F.213.b] Having trained in it, the great and lofty royal families are discerned; the great and lofty priestly families are discerned; the great and lofty householder families are discerned; the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm are discerned; the gods of the Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, and Paranirmitavaśa-vartin realms are discerned; the gods of Brahmakāyika, Brahmapurohita, Brahmapariṣadya, Mahābrahmā, Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsva, Śubha, Parīttāśubha, Apramāṇaśubha, {Ki.II-III: 182} Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhat, Parīttabṛhat, Apramāṇabṛhat, Bṛhatphala, Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, and Akaniṣṭha are all discerned; the gods of the sphere of infinite space are discerned; and the gods of the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception are discerned. [Having trained in it], the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, and the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth are discerned, arhatship and individual enlightenment are discerned, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is discerned.

28.67 “Also,⁴⁰⁵ if this perfection of wisdom is discerned, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are discerned; the perfection of generosity is discerned; the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are discerned; the emptiness of internal phenomena and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are discerned; the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.214.a] the three gateways to liberation, and the extrasensory powers are discerned; all the meditative stabilities and all the dhāraṇī gateways are discerned; the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are discerned; and [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are discerned.

28.68 “Indeed, it is from this perfection of wisdom that all phenomena are extensively revealed. Having trained in it, the great and lofty royal families are discerned; the great and lofty priestly families are discerned; the great and lofty householder families are discerned; the gods of the Caturmahārāja-kāyika realm are discerned; the gods of Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Brahmakāyika, Brahmapurohita, Brahmapariṣadya, Mahābrahmā, Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parīttaśubha, Apramāṇaśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhat, Parīttabṛhat, Apramāṇabṛhat, Bṛhatphala, Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, and Akaniṣṭha are all discerned; and the gods of the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception are discerned. [Having trained in it], these who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa are discerned; those who are destined for only one more rebirth, those who are no longer subject to rebirth, arhats, pratyekabuddhas, and bodhisattvas are discerned; and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are discerned. For those reasons, this is designated as the precious perfection.

28.69 “In this precious perfection, [F.214.b] there is nothing at all that arises or ceases, nothing that is defiled or purified, nothing that is to be retained or forsaken. If you ask why, it is because there is nothing at all that could arise or cease, nothing that could be defiled or purified, nothing that could be retained or forsaken. Subhūti, in this precious perfection, there are no phenomena at all that are apprehensible, be they virtuous, nonvirtuous, {Ki.II-III: 183} mundane, supramundane, contaminated, uncontaminated, conditioned, or unconditioned. For this reason, Subhūti, this precious perfection is nonapprehensible.

28.70 “Subhūti, this precious perfection is unsullied by anything whatsoever. If you ask why, it is because the phenomena by which it might be sullied are nonapprehensible. Subhūti, for that reason this perfection is [designated as] the precious perfection that is unsullied. Subhūti, if, when bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, they do not perceive in that manner, do not conceptualize in that manner, and do not elaborate in that manner, they are indeed practicing the perfection of wisdom. They are cultivating the perfection of wisdom. They please the lord buddhas. Thinking of the lord buddhas, they proceed from one buddhafield to another buddhafield in order to serve, respect, honor, and worship the lord buddhas; and when they proceed from one buddhafield to another buddhafield, they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafields.

28.71 “Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom does not teach, reveal, disclose, grasp, offer, produce, [F.215.a] terminate, afflict, purify, diminish, or enhance anything at all; nor is it past, future, or present.

28.72 “Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom does not transcend the realm of desire, nor is it established in it. It does not transcend the realm of form, nor is it established in it. It does not transcend the realm of formlessness, nor is it established in it. It neither brings about nor prevents the perfection of generosity. It neither brings about nor prevents the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. It neither brings about nor prevents the emptiness of internal phenomena. It neither brings about nor prevents [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. It neither brings about nor prevents the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. It neither brings about nor prevents the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions. It neither brings about nor prevents the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers. It neither brings about nor prevents the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways. It neither brings about nor prevents the powers of the tathāgatas, {Ki.II-III: 184} the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. It neither brings about nor prevents the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. It neither brings about nor prevents the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship. [F.215.b] It neither brings about nor prevents individual enlightenment. It neither brings about nor prevents knowledge of the path. It neither brings about nor prevents all-aspect omniscience. [B41]

28.73 “This perfection of wisdom does not prevent the conditioned elements, nor does it bring about the unconditioned elements. If you ask why, it is because, regardless of whether the tathāgatas have appeared or not, it dwells as the reality of all phenomena, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, and maturity with respect to all phenomena. That is the consummate buddhahood attained by the tathāgatas. Comprehending it, they attain consummate buddhahood, and having manifestly comprehended that, they describe, teach, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and reveal it.”

28.74 Then many thousands of gods, congregating in the midst of the heavens, cheered long and loud. They scattered their divine flowers—blue lotuses, day lotuses, night lotuses, white lotuses, coral flowers, and large coral flowers—and they said, “Ah! Through the teaching of this perfection of wisdom, many thousands of gods have accepted that phenomena are nonarising. We have seen the wheel of the Dharma turned for the second time in Jambudvīpa!”

28.75 Then the Blessed One addressed the elder Subhūti: “Subhūti, owing to the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, this turning of the wheel of the Dharma is not the first [in Jambudvīpa], nor is it the second. This perfection of wisdom is not at all established as a doctrine that is to be set in motion or not set in motion.”

28.76 “Blessed Lord, what is the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, owing to which this perfection of wisdom is not at all established as a doctrine to be set in motion or not set in motion?” [F.216.a]

28.77 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is empty of the perfection of wisdom. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are empty of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. The emptiness of internal phenomena is empty of the emptiness of internal phenomena. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are empty of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth].

28.78 “The applications of mindfulness are empty of the applications of mindfulness. The correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are empty of the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. {Ki.II-III: 185} The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are empty of the extrasensory powers [and so forth]. The meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth].

28.79 “The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is empty of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. The fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth and the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth are empty of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth [and so forth]. Arhatship is empty of arhatship. Individual enlightenment is empty of individual enlightenment. [F.216.b] Knowledge of the path is empty of knowledge of the path. All-aspect omniscience is empty of all-aspect omniscience.”

28.80 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have is great, for the perfection of wisdom is empty of inherent existence. This implies that all phenomena are empty of all phenomena, and although bodhisattva great beings dwell in the perfection of wisdom and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, there is nothing at all that attains consummate buddhahood. Although they indeed turn the wheel of the Dharma, there is nothing at all that is set in motion, not set in motion, or further set in motion. There is nothing at all that they see or do not see. If one were to ask why, it is because anything that set it in motion, did not set it in motion, or further set it in motion cannot be apprehended. If one were to ask why, it is because all phenomena are absolutely not brought into being. If one were to ask why, it is because emptiness does not set in motion or not set in motion anything at all. Signlessness does not set in motion or not set in motion anything at all. Wishlessness does not set in motion or not set in motion anything at all. That which describes, explains, proclaims, establishes, posits, analyzes, interprets, mentions, elucidates, introduces, and reveals the perfection of wisdom in this manner is the absolutely pure exposition of the perfection of wisdom. This exposition of the perfection of wisdom has neither been explained by anyone at all, nor has it been grasped by anyone at all. That which has neither been explained by anyone at all, nor grasped by anyone at all has not been brought into being by anyone at all. For that which has not been brought into being by anyone at all, there is no passing into final nirvāṇa. [F.217.a] Nor is there anyone at all who is worthy of offerings on account of this exposition of the Dharma.”

CHAPTER 29

29.1 {Ki.IV: 1} Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is nonexistent.”⁴⁰⁶

“This is owing to the nonexistence of space!” replied the Blessed One.

29.2 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is sameness.”

“This is owing to the sameness of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.

29.3 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is void.”

“This is owing to emptiness, beyond limitations!” replied the Blessed One.

29.4 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is invincible.”

“This is owing to the nonapprehension of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.

29.5 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is baseless.”

“This is owing to namelessness and noncorporeality!” replied the Blessed One.

29.6 “Blessed Lord, this perfection is the perfection like space.”

“This is owing to the nonexistence of the exhalation and inhalation of breath!” replied the Blessed One.

29.7 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is inexpressible.”

“This is owing to the nonapprehension of ideation and scrutiny!” replied the Blessed One.

29.8 “Blessed Lord, [F.217.b] this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is nameless.”

“This is owing to the nonapprehension of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness!” replied the Blessed One.

29.9 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is unmoving.”

- “This is owing to the nonmoving of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.10 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that cannot be appropriated.”
- “This is owing to the nongrasping of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.11 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is inexhaustible.”
- “This is owing to the absolute exhaustion of all phenomena!”⁴⁰⁷ replied the Blessed One. {Ki.IV:2}
- 29.12 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is nonarising.”
- “This is owing to the nonarising and nonceasing of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.13 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without a creator.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of [any] creators!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.14 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without a knower.”
- “This is owing to the inanimate nature of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.15 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that does not transmigrate.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of death and rebirth!”⁴⁰⁸ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.16 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that does not disintegrate.”
- “This is owing to the nondisintegration of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One. [F.218.a]
- 29.17 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection like a dream.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the perception of dreams!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.18 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection like an echo.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of a listener or a speaker!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.19 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection like an optical aberration.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of mirrors and reflections!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.20 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection like a mirage.”

- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of flowing water!”⁴⁰⁹ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.21 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection like a magical display.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of signs!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.22 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without delusion.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the darkness of ignorance!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.23 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without afflicted mental states.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of all afflicted mental states!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.24 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without purification.”
- “This is owing to the nonexistence of afflicted mental states!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.25 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without apprehending.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of a basis!”⁴¹⁰ replied the Blessed One. [F.218.b]
- 29.26 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without conceptual elaboration.”
- “This is owing to the eradication of all conceptual elaborations!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.27 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without conceits.”
- “This is owing to the eradication of all conceits!” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.IV:3}
- 29.28 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is unshakeable.”
- “This is owing to the stability of the realm of phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.29 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection free from desires.”
- “This is owing to the incontrovertible, genuinely manifest buddhahood of all phenomena!”⁴¹¹ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.30 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without obsession.”⁴¹²
- “This is owing to the nonconceptuality of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.

- 29.31 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is at peace.”
“This is owing to the signlessness and nonapprehension of all phenomena!”⁴¹³ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.32 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without desire.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of desire!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.33 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without hatred.”
“This is owing to the absence of hatred!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.34 “Blessed Lord, [F.219.a] this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without delusion.”
“This is owing to the dispelling of all the darkness of ignorance!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.35 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection without afflicted mental states.”
“This is owing to the absence of imaginary thoughts!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.36 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is not sentient.”
“This is owing to the absence of beings!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.37 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is forsaken.”⁴¹⁴
“This is owing to the nonarising of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.38 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that does not resort to the two extremes.”
“This is owing to the abandonment of extremes!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.39 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is undifferentiated.”
“This is owing to the nonassociation of all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.40 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is unblemished.”
“This is owing to the transcendence of the śrāvaka and pratyekabuddha levels!” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.IV: 4}
- 29.41 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is nonconceptual.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of all concepts!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.42 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is nameless.” [F.219.b]

- "This is owing to the nonapprehension of the dimensions of all phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.43 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is [unattached] like space."
- "This is owing to the absence of attachment with regard to all phenomena!"⁴¹⁵ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.44 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is impermanent."
- "This is owing to the nondisintegration of all phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.45 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is imbued with suffering."
- "This is owing to the absence of preoccupation with all phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.46 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is not a self."
- "This is owing to nonfixation upon all phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.47 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is emptiness."
- "This is owing to the nonapprehension of all phenomena!"⁴¹⁶ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.48 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is without defining characteristics."
- "This is owing to the nonestablishment of all phenomena!"⁴¹⁷ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.49 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of internal phenomena."
- "This is owing to the nonapprehension of internal phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.50 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of external phenomena."
- "This is owing to the nonapprehension of external phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.51 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of external and internal phenomena." [F.220.a]
- "This is owing to the nonapprehension of external and internal phenomena!" replied the Blessed One.
- 29.52 "Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of emptiness."

- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of emptiness!”
replied the Blessed One.
- 29.53 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of great extent.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of great extent!” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.IV: 5}
- 29.54 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of ultimate reality.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of ultimate reality!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.55 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of conditioned phenomena.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of conditioned phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.56 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of unconditioned phenomena.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of unconditioned phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.57 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of the unlimited.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of the unlimited!”
replied the Blessed One.
- 29.58 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.59 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of nonexclusion.” [F.220.b]
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of nonexclusion!”
replied the Blessed One.
- 29.60 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of inherent existence.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of conditioned and unconditioned phenomena!”⁴¹⁸ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.61 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of all phenomena.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of internal and external phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.62 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics.”

- “This is owing to the voidness of the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.63 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of nonapprehensibility.”
- “This is owing to the voidness of the emptiness of nonapprehensibility!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.64 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of nonentities.”
- “This is owing to reality, which is nonentity!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.65 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of the essential nature.”
- “This is owing to the voidness of essential nature with respect to all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.66 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities.” {Ki.IV: 6}
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities!”⁴¹⁹ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.67 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the applications of mindfulness.” [F.221.a]
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the body, feelings, mind, and phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.68 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the correct exertions.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of virtuous and nonvirtuous attributes!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.69 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the supports for miraculous ability.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the four supports for miraculous ability!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.70 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the faculties.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the five faculties!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.71 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the powers.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the five powers!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.72 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the branches of enlightenment.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of the seven branches of enlightenment!” replied the Blessed One.

- 29.73 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the path.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the noble eightfold path!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.74 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes emptiness.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the aspects of emptiness and the aspect of voidness!”⁴²⁰ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.75 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes signlessness.” [F.221.b]
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the aspects of peace!”⁴²¹ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.76 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes wishlessness.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of aspirations!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.77 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the aspects of liberation.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the eight aspects of liberation!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.78 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the serial steps of meditative absorption.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of the nine serial steps of meditative absorption!” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.IV:7}
- 29.79 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of generosity.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of miserliness!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.80 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of ethical discipline.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of degenerate morality!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.81 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of tolerance.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of malice and tolerance!”⁴²² replied the Blessed One.
- 29.82 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of perseverance.”
“This is owing to the nonapprehension of indolence and perseverance!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.83 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of meditative concentration.”

- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of meditative concentration and agitation!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.84 “Blessed Lord, [F.222.a] this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of wisdom.”
- “This is owing to the nonapprehension of wisdom and stupidity!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.85 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the ten powers.”
- “This is owing to their uncrushability by all phenomena!”⁴²³ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.86 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the four fearlessnesses.”
- “This is owing to their undauntedness concerning knowledge of the path!”⁴²⁴ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.87 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the four kinds of exact knowledge.”
- “This is owing to the absence of attachment and absence of obstruction with respect to all-aspect omniscience!” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.IV: 8}
- 29.88 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that constitutes the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.”
- “This is owing to the transcendence of all the doctrines of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.89 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of the tathāgatas.”
- “This is owing to the real nature of all their expressions!”⁴²⁵ replied the Blessed One.
- 29.90 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection that is naturally arisen.”
- “This is owing to the sway that it holds over all phenomena!” replied the Blessed One.
- 29.91 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the perfection of the buddhas.”
- “This is owing to the attainment of consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena, in all their finest aspects!”⁴²⁶ replied the Blessed One. [F.222.b]
- 29.92 This completes the twenty-ninth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 30

- 30.1 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, thought, “Those noble sons or noble daughters in whose ears this perfection of wisdom resounds have venerated the conquerors of the past. Those beings in whose ears this perfection of wisdom resounds have grown the roots of virtuous action in the presence of the tathāgatas. Those beings in whose ears this perfection of wisdom resounds have been accepted by spiritual mentors. Leaving aside those who have taken up, upheld, recited, mastered, and focused their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, and who, having taken up, upheld, recited, and mastered it, then earnestly applied the perfection of wisdom in its real nature—apart from them, those noble sons or noble daughters who, having heard this perfection of wisdom are neither fearful, nor afraid, nor terrified, have questioned and petitioned the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past. Those noble sons or noble daughters who, having heard this perfection of wisdom, are neither fearful, nor afraid, nor terrified, and who have [also] taken up, upheld, recited, mastered, and focused their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, have been cultivating the perfection of generosity, and have been practicing the perfections of ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom for many eons.” {Ki.IV:9}
- 30.2 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, those noble sons or noble daughters who, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, and are neither fearful, nor afraid, nor terrified, but take up, uphold, recite, [F.223.a] master, and focus their attention correctly on it, should be held to resemble irreversible bodhisattva great beings. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is profound. Those who have not practiced the six perfections in the past could not become devoted to it, after just hearing it. Blessed Lord, those noble sons or noble daughters who think of abandoning this profound perfection of wisdom after hearing it have indeed abandoned this profound perfection of wisdom in the past. If one were to ask why, it is because when this profound perfection of wisdom is explained, those noble sons or noble daughters are without faith and devotion. Those noble sons or noble daughters have not venerated the lord buddhas, bodhisattva great beings, and śrāvakas in the past. They have not made requests and have not asked how the perfection of generosity should be practiced; how the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom should be practiced; how the emptiness of internal phenomena should be cultivated; how [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, should be cultivated; how the applications of mindfulness should be cultivated; how the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path should be cultivated; how the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, [F.223.b] the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers should be cultivated; how the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways should be cultivated; and how the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, [Ki.IV: 10] the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas should be cultivated.”

30.3 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, said to the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, since this perfection of wisdom is absolutely profound, when this profound perfection of wisdom is revealed, why is it so astonishing that bodhisattva great beings who did not practice it in the past and lacked devotion are [now] not devoted to the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Why is that so astonishing? Venerable Śāradvatīputra, [F.224.a]

I pay homage to the perfection of wisdom! One who pays homage to the perfection of wisdom pays homage to the wisdom that knows all phenomena.”

- 30.4 Then the Blessed One said to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, “It is so! Kauśika, it is so! One who pays homage to the perfection of wisdom pays homage to the wisdom that knows all phenomena. If you ask why, Kauśika, the all-aspect omniscience of the lord buddhas originates therefrom, and [conversely] it is on the basis of the wisdom that knows all phenomena that the perfection of wisdom is expressed. Kauśika, noble sons or noble daughters who wish to dwell in all-aspect omniscience should dwell in the perfection of wisdom. Noble sons or noble daughters who wish to attain the wisdom of knowledge of the path, who wish to abandon all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, and who wish to turn the wheel of the Dharma, should persevere in the perfection of wisdom. Noble sons or noble daughters who wish to establish beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, who wish to establish them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, in the fruit on no longer being subject to rebirth, and in arhatship, who wish to establish them in individual enlightenment, and who wish to establish them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should persevere in the perfection of wisdom. Noble sons or noble daughters who wish to establish beings in buddhahood should persevere in the perfection of wisdom. Noble sons or noble daughters who wish to perfect the three realms should persevere in the perfection of wisdom. Noble sons or noble daughters who wish to defeat all the demonic forces of Māra should persevere in the perfection of wisdom. [F.224.b] Noble sons or noble daughters who wish to foster the saṅgha of monks should persevere in the perfection of wisdom.” {Ki.IV: 11}

- 30.5 Śakra, mighty lord of the gods then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings dwell in the perfection of wisdom? How do they dwell in the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity? Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they persevere in the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom? How do they persevere in the emptiness of internal phenomena? How do they persevere in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities? How do they persevere in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment? How do they persevere in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers? How do they persevere in the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways? How do they persevere in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas?”

- 30.6 “Kauśika, [F.225.a] excellent!” replied the Blessed One. “It is excellent that you thought to question the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha about this matter. Kauśika, your inspired speech has indeed come about through the blessing of the buddhas. Kauśika, in this regard, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not dwell in physical forms, and when they do not dwell in physical forms, at that time they do not persevere⁴²⁷ with physical forms. They do not dwell in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, and when they do not dwell in consciousness [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with consciousness [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the eyes, and when they do not dwell in the eyes, at that time they do not persevere with the eyes. They do not dwell in the ears, nose, tongue, body, or mental faculty, and when they do not dwell in the mental faculty [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the mental faculty [and so forth]. They do not dwell in sights, and when they do not dwell in sights, at that time they do not persevere with sights. They do not dwell in sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, or mental phenomena, and when they do not dwell in mental phenomena [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with mental phenomena [and so forth]. They do not dwell in visual consciousness, they do not dwell in visually compounded sensory contact, and they do not dwell in feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact; they do not dwell in auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, or mental consciousness; they do not dwell in mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and they do not dwell in feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]; and when they do not dwell in feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the earth element, and when they do not dwell in the earth element, at that time they do not persevere with the earth element. They do not dwell in the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, {Ki.IV: 12} or the consciousness element, and when they do not dwell in the consciousness element [and so forth], [F.225.b] at that time they do not persevere with the consciousness element [and so forth]. They do not dwell in ignorance, and when they do not dwell in ignorance, at that time they do not persevere with ignorance. They do not dwell in formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, or aging and death, and when they do not dwell in aging and death [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with aging and death [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the perfection of generosity, and when they do not dwell in the perfection of generosity, at that time they do not persevere with the perfection of generosity. They do not dwell in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom, and when they do not dwell in the perfection of wisdom [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and when they do not dwell in the emptiness of internal phenomena, at that time they do not persevere with the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not dwell in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and when they do not dwell in the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the applications of mindfulness, and when they do not dwell in the applications of mindfulness, at that time they do not persevere with the applications of mindfulness. They do not dwell in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path, and when they do not dwell in the noble eightfold path [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, [F.226.a] or the formless absorptions, and when they do not dwell in the formless absorptions [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the formless absorptions [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers, and when they do not dwell in the extrasensory powers [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the extrasensory powers [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways, and when they do not dwell in the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and when they do not dwell in the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They do not dwell in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit on no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment, and when they do not dwell in individual enlightenment [and so forth], at that time they do not persevere with individual enlightenment [and so forth]. They do not dwell in knowledge of the path or all-aspect omniscience, and when they do not dwell in all-aspect omniscience [and knowledge of the path], at that time they do not persevere with all-aspect omniscience [and knowledge of the path].

30.7 “If you ask why, Kauśika, it is because they do not apprehend physical forms in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend the sense fields, [F.226.b] sensory elements, or links of dependent origination in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit on no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere. They do not apprehend knowledge of the path or all-aspect omniscience in which they should dwell and in which they should persevere.

30.8 “Moreover, Kauśika,⁴²⁸ when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not engage with or differentiate physical forms, and when they do not engage with or differentiate physical forms, at that time they do persevere with physical forms. They do not engage with or differentiate feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, and when they do not engage with or differentiate consciousness [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with consciousness [and so forth]. They do not engage with or differentiate the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination, and when they do not engage with or differentiate the links of dependent origination [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. [F.227.a] They do not engage with or differentiate any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, and when they do not engage with or differentiate the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. They do not engage with or differentiate the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers, and when they do not engage with or differentiate the extrasensory powers [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with the extrasensory powers [and so forth]. They do not engage with or differentiate the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways, and when they do not engage with or differentiate the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They do not engage with or differentiate the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and when they do not engage with or differentiate the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They do not engage with or differentiate [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, and when they do not engage with or differentiate all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], at that time they do persevere with all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. {Ki.IV: 13}

- 30.9 “If you ask why, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, they do not apprehend physical forms in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend physical forms in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend physical forms in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness in the limit of past time, [F.227.b] they do not apprehend consciousness [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend consciousness [and so forth] in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend the links of dependent origination [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend the links of dependent origination [and so forth] in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend the extrasensory powers [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend the extrasensory powers [and so forth] in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] in the intervening [present]. They do not apprehend [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, in the limit of past time, they do not apprehend all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] in the limit of future time, and they do not apprehend all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] in the intervening [present].”

30.10 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra said to the Blessed One, [F.228.a] “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is profound!”

“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of physical forms is profound. Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is profound. Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is profound. The perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment is profound. The perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways is profound. The perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is profound. The perfection of wisdom is profound because the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is profound.”

30.11 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom.”

“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because physical forms are hard to fathom. The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are hard to fathom. [F.228.b] The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are hard to fathom. The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are hard to fathom. The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are hard to fathom. The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are hard to fathom. The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are hard to fathom. The perfection of wisdom is hard to fathom because [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are hard to fathom.” {Ki.IV: 14}

30.12 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is immeasurable.”

“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because physical forms are immeasurable. Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are immeasurable. Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are immeasurable. The perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are immeasurable. [F.229.a] The perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are immeasurable. The perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are immeasurable. The perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are immeasurable. The perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are immeasurable.”

30.13 “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom?”

“Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not engage with the notion that physical forms are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.229.b] emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are profound, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. [B42]

30.14 “If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, the profundity of physical forms is not physical forms. The profundity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is not consciousness [and so forth]. The profundity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is not the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The profundity of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment is not the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. The profundity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers is not the extrasensory powers [and so forth]. The profundity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways is not the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. [F.230.a] The profundity of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is not the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. The profundity of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is not all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

- 30.15 “Śāradvatīputra, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not engage with the notion that physical forms are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and [F.230.b] the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are hard to fathom, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.

30.16 “If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, the unfathomability of physical forms is not physical forms. The unfathomability of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is not consciousness [and so forth]. The unfathomability of [the other phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is not all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. {Ki.IV: 15}

30.17 “Moreover, Śāradvatīputra, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they do not engage with the notion that physical forms are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are immeasurable, [F.231.a] then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If they do not engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are immeasurable, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom.

30.18 “If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, the immeasurability of physical forms is not physical forms. The immeasurability of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is not consciousness [and so forth]. The immeasurability of [the other phenomena, attributes, and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is not all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].”

30.19 Śāradvatīputra then said, “Ah! Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is so profound, so hard to fathom, and so hard to realize. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is so immeasurable. Blessed Lord, this should not be explained in the presence of bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered the vehicle. Having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, they would be fearful, afraid, and terrified. They would be hesitant and doubtful. They would be without devotion. Blessed Lord, this profound perfection of wisdom should be revealed in the presence of bodhisattva great beings. Having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, they will not be fearful, afraid, or terrified. They will not be hesitant or doubtful. Having heard it, they would be increasingly devoted, and they would take up, uphold, [F.231.b] recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it.”

30.20 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, asked the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, if this profound perfection of wisdom is explained in the presence of bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered the vehicle, what fault would there be?”

30.21 “Kauśika,” replied Śāradvatīputra, “if this profound perfection of wisdom is explained in the presence of bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered the vehicle, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, they would be fearful, afraid, and terrified. They would turn away from it. They would forsake it. They would be without devotion. Kauśika, having heard this perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings who have newly entered the vehicle would actualize and accumulate the world-forming deeds that descend into erroneous [paths] because they would have rejected it. It is difficult for those who have generated and accrued such world-forming deeds to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That is the situation!”

30.22 Śakra then asked, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, are there bodhisattva great beings, not yet prophesied, who, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, will not be afraid, fearful, or terrified?”

30.23 “Kauśika, those bodhisattva great beings who will not be afraid, fearful, or terrified, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, will be prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment before long. {Ki.IV: 16} They will be prophesied to attain [all the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, before they have encountered more than one or [F.232.a] two tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas.”

30.24 Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “It is so, Śāradvatīputra! It is so! Śāradvatīputra, those bodhisattva great beings who, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, will not be fearful, afraid, or terrified, and who, having heard it, will increasingly take up, uphold, recite, master, and maintain the perfection of wisdom, just as it has been taught, will have entered into the vehicle for a long period of time. They will have practiced the six perfections. They will have venerated many buddhas.”

30.25 Śāradvatīputra then declared, “Blessed Lord, I am inspired to elucidate this by way of some analogies! Sugata, I am inspired to elucidate this by way of some analogies!”

“Śāradvatīputra, be inspired!” replied the Blessed One.

30.26 “Blessed Lord,” said Śāradvatīputra, “it is just as if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas in a dream were to cultivate the perfection of wisdom, be absorbed in the meditative concentrations, undertake perseverance, practice tolerance, maintain ethical discipline, and practice generosity, and then reach as far as the site of enlightenment—one would then know, Blessed Lord, that those noble sons or noble daughters have indeed drawn near to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Blessed Lord, what need one say about bodhisattva great beings who, when they are not asleep, have cultivated the perfection of wisdom, been absorbed in the meditative concentrations, undertaken perseverance, practiced tolerance, maintained ethical discipline, [F.232.b] and practiced generosity! Blessed Lord, one would know that those [latter] noble sons or noble daughters have drawn near to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Blessed Lord, those who have heard this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having heard it, then retain it and earnestly apply it in an authentic manner,⁴²⁹ will ripen the roots of virtuous action. Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom will have entered the vehicle for a long period of time and will have cultivated the roots of virtuous action. They will have venerated many buddhas. They will have been accepted by spiritual mentors. Blessed Lord, those noble sons or noble daughters are near to being prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They will be prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Blessed Lord, those noble sons or noble daughters who accord with this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having accorded with it, then take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it should be known to be making progress to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment that is irreversible. {Ki.IV: 17}

30.27 “Blessed Lord, it is just as when some men, coming out of a wilderness of one hundred yojanas, or coming out of a wilderness of two hundred, three hundred, four hundred, or five hundred yojanas, might see signs indicative of a village, city, market town, region, or royal capital, such as cowherds, herders, border posts, excellent orchards, [F.233.a] or excellent woodlands—or if they were to see, by means of other signs apart from these, that they were clearly approaching a village, city, market town, region, or royal capital—they would think that when these indications appear they are indeed approaching a village, city, market town, region, or royal capital.

They would be relieved, and thenceforth there would be no fear of robbers, fear of brigands, fear of savage wild beasts, or fear of hunger and thirst. Blessed Lord, in the same way, when bodhisattva great beings have accorded with this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having accorded with it, also taken up, upheld, recited, mastered, and focused their attention correctly on it, one should know that at that time, Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings are near to being prophesied and before long they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Thenceforth those bodhisattva great beings will not fear the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. If one were to ask why, it is because the sight of this profound perfection of wisdom, paying homage to it and listening to it, are indications heralding unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

30.28 “It is so, Śāradvatīputra. It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Śāradvatīputra, may you now again be inspired by the power of the buddhas!”

30.29 “Blessed Lord, it is just as if there were some men wishing to see the shores of the great ocean—the closer they approached the great ocean in order to see it, [F.233.b] the more they would no longer see trees or the indications of a tree, or hills or the indication of a hill, [and they would know] on that basis that the great ocean is near, the great ocean is not far away. {Ki.IV: 18} If one were to ask why, they would instinctively know that now the great ocean is near and not far away. If it is near there will be no trees or the indication of a tree, and no hills or the indication of a hill. So even though the eyes of those men do not yet see the great ocean, they understand that they are nearing the great ocean, and that the great ocean is in the vicinity, the great ocean is not far away. In the same way, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who hear, take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom should understand that they are near to being prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, even though the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have not yet prophesied them with the words, ‘You will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment within so many eons, within so many hundreds of eons, within so many thousands of eons, or within so many hundred billion trillions of eons.’ If one were to ask why, it is because they would know, ‘I am observing, paying homage to, and listening to this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having heard it, I am holding it, retaining it, reciting it, and mastering it, [F.234.a] focusing my attention correctly on it.’

30.30 “Blessed Lord, it is just as when spring approaches and the leaves and petals of plants appear and change color—the people of Jambudvīpa know that leaves, flowers, and fruits will appear before long because these are the indications that appear from plants. When plants turn to excellent leaves, flowers, and fruits, women, men, boys, and girls, on seeing those plants with excellent leaves, flowers, and fruits, feel happy. Blessed Lord, in the same way, when bodhisattva great beings see, pay homage to, venerate, and listen to this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having heard it, {Ki.IV: 19} also take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, at that time, Blessed Lord, one should know that those bodhisattva great beings have ripened the roots of virtuous action. Blessed Lord, one should know that those bodhisattva great beings have venerated many buddhas. Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings should know that since they themselves see, pay homage to, and listen to this profound perfection of wisdom, and earnestly apply the perfection of wisdom just as it has been revealed, through their former roots of virtuous action, they have drawn near to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Thereupon, all those gods who have seen the buddhas of the past [F.234.b] will observe the indications of those bodhisattva great beings and then rejoice, overjoyed, contented, and happy, that these bodhisattva great beings will be prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment before long, since the bodhisattva great beings of the past also experienced those indications that they would be prophesied [to attain enlightenment].

30.31 “Blessed Lord, it is just as when a pregnant woman undergoes physical changes as the time to give birth approaches—her body becomes more and more unshapely and lethargic, her mind becomes weak and irritable, her appetite is reduced, her senses become dull, she sleeps less and feels uncomfortable—because of her feelings she speaks little and abstains from intimate contact, feeling that such sensations are due to the inappropriate attentions in which she formerly indulged and on which she relied. Other women will know, the more they see this woman with such symptoms, that she will give birth before long. Blessed Lord, in the same way, when those bodhisattva great beings who have grown the roots of virtuous action, venerated many buddhas, practiced good conduct, been accepted by a spiritual mentor, and brought the roots of virtuous action to maturity accord with this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having accorded with it, also take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, then, Blessed Lord, one should know that those bodhisattva great beings will be prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment before long.”

30.32 “Excellent, Śāradvatīputra! Excellent!” replied the Blessed One. “Śāradvatīputra, this inspired speech of yours arises through the power of the buddhas.”

- 30.33 Then the venerable Subhūti [F.235.a] said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, it is most wonderful that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas will sustain those bodhisattva great beings so perfectly in that manner.” {Ki.IV:20}
- 30.34 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is in order to act for the benefit of many living creatures, to bring happiness to many living creatures, to act out of compassion for the world, and to act for the well-being, benefit, and happiness of a multitude of gods and human beings that those bodhisattva great beings have embarked in this way on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. While they are practicing the conduct of a bodhisattva they benefit many hundreds and thousands of living creatures through the four attractive qualities of a bodhisattva. If you ask what these four are, they comprise generosity, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and harmonious activity. Through these qualities they encourage beings toward the paths of the ten virtuous actions.
- 30.35 “They themselves are absorbed in the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions, and they also encourage others toward the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions. They themselves practice generosity and they also encourage others toward generosity. They themselves maintain ethical discipline, and they also encourage others toward ethical discipline. They themselves cultivate tolerance and they also encourage others toward tolerance. They themselves undertake perseverance and they also encourage others toward perseverance. They themselves are absorbed in meditative concentration and they also encourage others toward meditative concentration. They themselves cultivate wisdom and they also encourage others toward wisdom. [F.235.b] They dwell in the perfection of wisdom, and although through skillful means they establish beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, they themselves do not attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. Although they establish others in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment, they themselves do not actualize individual enlightenment [and so forth].
- 30.36 “They themselves practice the perfection of generosity, and they also encourage many thousands of other bodhisattvas toward the perfection of generosity. They themselves practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and they also encourage many thousands of other bodhisattvas toward the perfections of ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom. They themselves occupy the level at which progress has become irreversible, and they also establish others in the level at which progress has become irreversible. They themselves bring beings to maturity, and they also encourage others to bring beings to maturity. They themselves develop the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas, and they also encourage others toward the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas. They themselves refine the dhāraṇī gateways, and they also encourage others to refine the dhāraṇī gateways. They themselves acquire excellent inspired speech, and they also encourage others toward excellent inspired speech. They themselves assume an excellent physical form, [F.236.a] and they also encourage others to acquire an excellent physical form. They themselves assume the excellent major marks, and they also encourage others to acquire the excellent marks. {Ki.IV:21} They themselves assume the excellent status of a prince, and they also encourage others toward the excellent status of a prince. They themselves cultivate the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, and they also encourage others toward the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They themselves cultivate the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the five extrasensory powers, and they also encourage others toward the five extrasensory powers [and so forth]. They themselves cultivate all the meditative stabilities and all the dhāraṇī gateways, and they also encourage others toward all the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They themselves achieve the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and they also encourage others toward the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They themselves attain all-aspect omniscience, and they also encourage others toward all-aspect omniscience. They themselves abandon all afflictive mental states associated with reincarnation through [past] propensities, and they also encourage others to abandon all afflictive mental states associated with reincarnation through [past] propensities. They themselves turn the wheel of the Dharma, and they also encourage others to turn the wheel of the Dharma.”

30.37 The venerable Subhūti then said to the Blessed One, [F.236.b] “It is wonderful, Blessed Lord, it is wonderful, Sugata, that those bodhisattva great beings endowed with many attributes practice the perfection of wisdom and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of all beings! Blessed Lord, how will the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have be perfected?"

30.38 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "while bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, when they do not observe the enhancement of physical forms, and when they do not observe the enhancement of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. Subhūti, while bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, when they do not observe the enhancement of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination, and when they do not observe the enhancement of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the enhancement of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. {Ki.IV: 22} [F.237.a] When they do not observe the enhancement of the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the enhancement of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. Subhūti, while bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, when they do not observe the enhancement of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected.

30.39 "Subhūti, while bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, when they do not observe the diminution of physical forms and when they do not observe the diminution of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the diminution of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the diminution of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. [F.237.b] When they do not observe the diminution of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the diminution of the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the diminution of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected. When they do not observe the diminution of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected.

30.40 “Moreover, Subhūti, while bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, when they do not observe the notion of phenomena; do not observe the notion of nonphenomena; do not observe the notion of the past; do not observe the notion of the future; do not observe the notion of the present; do not observe the notion of virtuous action, the notion of nonvirtuous action, [F.238.a] or the notion of indeterminate action; do not observe the notion of conditioned phenomena or the notion of unconditioned phenomena; do not observe the notion of the realm of desire; do not observe the notion of the realm of form; do not observe the notion of the realm of formlessness; do not observe the notion of the perfection of generosity; do not observe the notions of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom; and do not observe the notion of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be perfected.

30.41 “If you ask why, Subhūti, it is owing to the defining characteristics of all phenomena, and owing to irreversibility, voidness, hollowness, essencelessness, impotence, and lifelessness.”

30.42 “Blessed Lord, the inconceivable is being revealed!” said Subhūti.

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of physical forms. The inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of feelings, perceptions, {Ki.IV: 23} formative predispositions, and consciousness. Subhūti, the inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. Subhūti, the inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the perfection of generosity. The inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, [F.238.b] the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, the inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the emptiness of internal phenomena. The inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Subhūti, the inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. The inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. The inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. The inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Subhūti, the inconceivable is revealed owing to the inconceivability of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

30.43 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, if they do not perceive the notion that physical forms are inconceivable, and if they do not perceive that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are inconceivable, then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom. When bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, if they do not perceive the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are inconceivable, [F.239.a] then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom. If they do not perceive the notion that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are inconceivable, then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom. If they do not perceive the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are inconceivable, then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom. If they do not perceive the notion that the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are inconceivable, then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom. If they do not perceive the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are inconceivable, then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom. If they do not perceive the notion that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are inconceivable, then they are perfecting the perfection of wisdom.”

30.44 “Blessed Lord, who will be devoted to this profound perfection of wisdom?

“Bodhisattva great beings who have practiced the six perfections, who have grown the roots of virtuous action, venerated many buddhas, and been accepted by spiritual mentors will be devoted to this profound perfection of wisdom,” replied the Blessed One.

30.45 “Blessed Lord, [F.239.b] to what extent have such bodhisattva great beings practiced the six perfections, grown the roots of virtuous action, venerated many buddhas, and been accepted by spiritual mentors?”

30.46 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “in this regard, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not imagine or construe physical forms, they do not imagine or construe the indications of physical forms, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of physical forms. They do not imagine or construe feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; they do not imagine or construe the indications of consciousness [and so forth]; and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of consciousness [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; they do not imagine or construe the indications of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]; and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe the realm of desire, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the realm of desire, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the realm of desire. They do not imagine or construe the realm of form, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the realm of form, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the realm of form. They do not imagine or construe the realm of formlessness, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the realm of formlessness, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the realm of formlessness. They do not imagine or construe the perfection of generosity, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the perfection of generosity, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the perfection of generosity. They do not imagine or construe the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, {Ki.IV: 24} the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom; [F.240.a] they do not imagine or construe the indications of the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]; and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe the emptiness of internal phenomena, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not imagine or construe [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; they do not imagine or construe the indications of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]; and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They do not imagine or construe the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers; they do not imagine or construe the indications of the extrasensory powers [and so forth]; and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the extrasensory powers [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways, they do not imagine or construe the indications of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; they do not imagine or construe the indications of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], [F.240.b] and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They do not imagine or construe [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience; they do not imagine or construe the indications of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]; and they do not imagine or construe the inherent existence of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because physical forms are inconceivable. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are inconceivable. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are inconceivable. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are inconceivable. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are inconceivable. The meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are inconceivable. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are inconceivable. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are inconceivable. Subhūti, such are the bodhisattva great beings who have practiced the six perfections, grown the roots of virtuous action, venerated many buddhas, and been accepted by spiritual mentors.”

30.47 “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is profound!” said Subhūti.

The Blessed One replied, “The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of physical forms. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, [F.241.a] and consciousness. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. The perfection of wisdom is profound owing to the profundity of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

30.48 “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is a mass of precious gems. It bestows⁴³⁰ the masses of the precious gems of the Dharma. That is to say, it bestows the paths of the ten virtuous actions, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the five extrasensory powers. It bestows the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. It bestows the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.241.b] emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. It bestows the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. It bestows the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. It bestows [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

30.49 “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom turns the wheel of the Dharma. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is a mass of purity owing to the purity of physical forms; the purity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, {Ki.IV: 25} and consciousness; the purity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; the purity of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; the purity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers; the purity of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways; the purity of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and the purity of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

30.50 “Blessed Lord, it would be so astonishing if many obstacles do not arise when a profound perfection of wisdom such as this is revealed.”

30.51 “Subhūti, it is so! Subhūti, it is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, this profound perfection of wisdom will encounter many obstacles. For this reason, [F.242.a] noble sons or noble daughters should commit to writing, recite, teach, and cultivate this profound perfection of wisdom, focusing their attention correctly on it. In order that obstacles might not occur, even if they are committing it to writing, they should do so swiftly, and even if they are reciting, teaching, and cultivating it, focusing their attention correctly on it, they should do so swiftly. Therefore, Subhūti, even if noble sons or noble daughters have one month in which to commit it to writing, they should do so. Even if they have two months, if they have three months, if they have four months, if they have five months, if they have six months, or if they have up to one year in which to commit it to writing, they should do so. Even if they have one month in which to teach it, confer the scriptural transmission, disseminate it, or cultivate it, focusing their attention correctly on it, then they should do so; and even if they have up to one year in which to cultivate it [and so forth], they should do so. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because phenomena that are most precious encounter many obstacles.”

- 30.52 “Blessed Lord, it would be very astonishing if the evil forces of Māra were not to cause obstacles to prevent by whatever means this profound perfection of wisdom from being committed to writing, recited, taught, disseminated, and cultivated, and having attention correctly focused on it!”
- 30.53 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is not the case that the evil forces of Māra do not cause obstacles in order to prevent by whatever means this profound perfection of wisdom from being committed to writing, recited, taught, cultivated, and having attention correctly focused on it. However, despite that, they cannot inflict obstacles on bodhisattva great beings who do commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, disseminate, or cultivate it.” {Ki.IV:26}
- 30.54 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the Blessed One, [F.242.b] “Blessed Lord, through whose power do the evil forces of Māra not obstruct bodhisattva great beings who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, recite it, disseminate it, focus their attention correctly on it, and cultivate it?”
- 30.55 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “it is through the power of the buddhas that the evil forces of Māra cannot cause obstacles for bodhisattva great beings who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, disseminate, cultivate, or focus their attention correctly on it. Śāradvatīputra, it is also through the power of all those lord buddhas who are alive and present in the world systems of the ten directions, teaching the Dharma, that the evil forces of Māra cannot cause obstacles for bodhisattva great beings who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, or focus their attention correctly on it. Those lord buddhas indeed have their enlightened intention directed toward those bodhisattva great beings, and accept them, so that the evil forces of Māra cannot cause obstacles for those bodhisattva great beings who have been accepted by the lord buddhas and who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, or focus their attention correctly on it. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because the evil forces of Māra are incapable of causing obstacles for bodhisattva great beings who have been accepted by the buddhas and who have pursued virtuous attributes. Śāradvatīputra, it is in accord with reality that the immeasurable and countless tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are alive at present, residing in the immeasurable, countless world systems of all the ten directions, [F.243.a] teaching the Dharma, direct their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and direct their enlightened intention toward those who recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it. Śāradvatīputra, noble sons and noble

- daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it should understand that it is through the power of the buddhas that they themselves are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and reciting, teaching, cultivating, and focusing their attention correctly on it.”
- 30.56 “Blessed Lord, should all noble sons and noble daughters whosoever know that they commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it, through the power of the buddhas, and are all of them sustained by the buddhas?”
- 30.57 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is as you have said. All noble sons or noble daughters whosoever should know that they commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it, {Ki.IV: 27} through the power of the buddhas. All of them should know that they are sustained by the buddhas.”
- 30.58 “Blessed Lord, the immeasurable and countless lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in immeasurable, countless world systems, [F.243.b] extending from the eastern direction throughout the ten directions, know those noble sons or noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it. Those lord buddhas see with the buddha eye and comprehend those who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it.”
- 30.59 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “The immeasurable and countless lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in immeasurable, countless world systems, extending from the eastern direction throughout the ten directions, know those noble sons or noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and recite, teach, disseminate, cultivate, and focus their attention correctly on it. They see them with the buddha eye and comprehend them. [B43]
- 30.60 “In this regard, Śāradvatīputra, those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who take up, uphold, recite, master, and cultivate this profound perfection of wisdom, focusing their attention correctly on it, and who earnestly apply it in an authentic manner,⁴³¹ should also know that they themselves are drawing near to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Śāradvatīputra, those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who have committed this profound perfection of wisdom to writing and keep it in the form of a book, also develop much devotion to this profound perfection of wisdom. [F.244.a] They serve, respect, honor, and worship this profound perfection of wisdom with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons. {Ki.IV: 28}

30.61 “So it is that those noble sons or noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing and keep it will incur great benefit, great excellence, great outcome, and great maturation. Śāradvatīputra, until they occupy the level at which progress has become irreversible, those noble sons or noble daughters on account of these roots of virtuous action will never be reborn in lower realms of existence. They will never be separated from the lord buddhas. Śāradvatīputra, until they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, those noble sons or noble daughters on account of these roots of virtuous action will never be separated from the six perfections. They will never be separated from the emptiness of internal phenomena. They will never be separated from [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They will never be separated from the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They will never be separated from the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—or the extrasensory powers. They will never be separated from the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways. [F.244.b] They will never be separated from the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.

30.62 “Śāradvatīputra, after the Tathāgata has passed into nirvāṇa, this perfection of wisdom will circulate in the south.⁴³² There, the monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing with firm devotion. They will take up, uphold, recite, and master it, focusing their attention correctly on it, and they will serve, respect, honor, and worship it with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons. On account of those roots of virtuous action, they will never lapse into lower realms of existence. They will experience the excellence of gods and humans, and they will be ennobled through the six perfections. Having been ennobled through these six perfections, they will serve, respect, honor, and worship the lord buddhas, and gradually pass into nirvāṇa through the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, the vehicle of the unsurpassed, completely awakened buddhas, or through all three vehicles.

30.63 “Śāradvatīputra, this profound perfection of wisdom will then circulate from the south to the east. There, too, the monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing with firm devotion. They will take up, uphold, {Ki.IV: 29} recite, and master it, focusing their attention correctly on it, and they will serve, respect, honor, and worship it with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, [F.245.a] powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons. On account of those roots of virtuous action, they will never lapse into lower realms of existence. They will experience the excellence of gods and humans, and they will be ennobled through the six perfections. Having been ennobled through these six perfections, they will serve, respect, honor, and worship the lord buddhas, and gradually pass into nirvāṇa through the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, the vehicle of the unsurpassed, completely awakened buddhas, or through all three vehicles.

30.64 “Śāradvatīputra, this profound perfection of wisdom will then circulate from the east to the north.⁴³³ There, too, the monks, nuns, laymen, and laywomen who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing with firm devotion. They will take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, and they will serve, respect, honor, and worship it with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons. On account of those roots of virtuous action, they will never lapse into lower realms of existence. They will experience the excellence of gods and humans, and they will be ennobled through the six perfections. Having been ennobled through these six perfections, they will serve, respect, honor, and worship the lord buddhas, and gradually pass into nirvāṇa through the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, [F.245.b] the vehicle of the unsurpassed, completely awakened buddhas, or through all three vehicles.

30.65 “Śāradvatīputra, so it is that, afterward, during the future, this perfection of wisdom will perform the activities of the buddhas in the south, the east, and the north for the final five-hundred[-year period of the Buddhist teaching].⁴³⁴ If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because the enlightened intention of the tathāgatas is the perfection of wisdom, and the perfection of wisdom is the enlightened intention of the tathāgatas. Śāradvatīputra, when noble sons or noble daughters flourish in the Dharma and in Vinaya, the Dharma will not decline. If you ask what is that Dharma, it is this perfection of wisdom. Śāradvatīputra, I turn my enlightened intention toward those noble sons or noble daughters who take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, and who earnestly apply it in an authentic manner. Śāradvatīputra, I turn my enlightened intention toward those noble sons or noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and who, having committed it to writing, also serve, respect, honor, and worship it with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons. Śāradvatīputra, on account of these roots of virtuous action, those noble sons or noble daughters will never lapse into lower realms of existence. They will experience the excellence of gods and humans, and they will be ennobled through the six perfections. Having been ennobled through these six perfections, they will serve, respect, honor, and worship the lord buddhas, and gradually pass into nirvāṇa through the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, the vehicle of the unsurpassed, completely awakened buddhas, or through all three vehicles. {Ki.IV: 30} [F.246.a]

30.66 “Śāradvatīputra, the tathāgatas see those noble sons or noble daughters with the eye of the buddhas. Śāradvatīputra, the tathāgatas mention those noble sons or noble daughters. Śāradvatīputra, the tathāgatas praise and extol those noble sons or noble daughters. Śāradvatīputra, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the ten directions who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma, also see those noble sons or noble daughters with the eye of the buddhas. Those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas mention, praise, and extol those noble sons or noble daughters. Śāradvatīputra, the tathāgatas praise and extol those noble sons or noble daughters.”

30.67 “Blessed Lord, afterward, in the future, will this profound perfection of wisdom flourish in the north?”

30.68 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Śāradvatīputra, afterward, in the future, this profound perfection of wisdom will flourish in the north. In this regard, Śāradvatīputra, afterward, in future times, those noble sons or noble daughters will hear this profound perfection of wisdom flourishing in the north, and having heard it they will also be devoted to it. Being devoted to it, they will also commit it to writing, and they will take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, and they will earnestly apply it in an authentic manner. Śāradvatīputra, you should know that those noble sons or noble daughters who hear this profound perfection of wisdom, and having heard are also devoted to it, and who, being devoted to it, also commit it to writing, and take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, and earnestly apply it in an authentic manner, have entered upon the vehicle for a long period of time, [F.246.b] venerated many buddhas, been accepted by spiritual mentors, and grown the roots of virtuous action.”

30.69 “Blessed Lord, afterward, in the future, how many noble sons or noble daughters in the north will hear this profound perfection of wisdom, and having heard it, be devoted to it, and being devoted to it, commit it to writing, take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, and earnestly apply it in an authentic manner?”

30.70 The Blessed One replied, “Śāradvatīputra, afterward, in the future, there will be many noble sons or noble daughters in the north who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. {Ki.IV: 31} Śāradvatīputra, when this profound perfection of wisdom is revealed, there will be many such noble sons or noble daughters following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who will not be cowed or discouraged, and not be fearful, afraid, or terrified. If you ask why, it is because those noble sons or noble daughters will have followed many tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, and those noble sons or noble daughters will have petitioned and questioned many tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. And if again you ask why, those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the perfection of wisdom. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the perfection of meditative concentration. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the perfection of perseverance. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the perfection of tolerance. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the perfection of ethical discipline. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the perfection of generosity. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the emptiness of internal phenomena. [F.247.a] Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—and the extrasensory powers. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. Those noble sons or noble daughters will perfect the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.

- 30.71 “Śāradvatīputra, those noble sons or noble daughters will be supported by the roots of virtuous action. They will act for the sake of many living creatures, in order that unsurpassed, complete enlightenment might be attained. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because I will have addressed those noble sons or noble daughters with words of all-aspect omniscience. All those lord buddhas who have appeared as tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas in the past have also addressed those noble sons or noble daughters with words of all-aspect omniscience. Even after they have passed away, [F.247.b] they will still be committed to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they will preach such modes [of all-aspect omniscience] to others for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 32}
- 30.72 “Śāradvatīputra, those noble sons or noble daughters will be absorbed. Since even Māra or the deities in the band of Māra will be unable to avert them from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, how much less could others intent on evil and engaged in evil dissuade them from this profound perfection of wisdom! Śāradvatīputra, those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, will rejoice and a magnificent feeling of happiness will arise. They will indeed establish many living creatures in virtuous attributes for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.
- 30.73 “Those noble sons or noble daughters have in my presence said, ‘Blessed Lord, while practicing the conduct of a bodhisattva, we will establish many hundreds of creatures, many thousands of creatures, many hundreds of thousands of creatures in enlightenment. We shall teach it, encourage them toward it, incite them, rejoice with them, and prophesy their irreversibility.’ If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, I have examined their thoughts with my mind and rejoiced in the words of those noble sons or noble daughters. Śāradvatīputra, in the presence of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past, too, those noble sons or noble daughters have said, ‘While practicing the conduct of a bodhisattva, we will establish many hundreds of creatures, many thousands of creatures, many hundreds of thousands of creatures in enlightenment. [F.248.a] We shall teach it, encourage them toward it, incite them, rejoice with them, and prophesy their irreversibility.’ If you ask why, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past have mentally examined their thoughts and rejoiced in the words of those noble sons or noble daughters. Śāradvatīputra, when those noble sons or noble daughters practice the conduct of a bodhisattva they will establish many hundreds of creatures, many thousands of creatures, many hundreds of thousands of creatures in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 33} They will teach it, encourage them toward it, incite them, rejoice with them, and prophesy their irreversibility.

30.74 “Śāradvatīputra, those noble sons or noble daughters will have sublime aspirations with regard to sights, sounds, odors, tastes, and tangibles. They will give sublime gifts. They will give sublime gifts and actualize the sublime roots of virtuous action. Having brought into being the sublime roots of virtuous action, they will be favored with sublime outcomes. Having been favored with sublime outcomes, they will for the sake of those beings be favored with even more sublime outcomes than those. In this manner they will give their belongings, outer or inner, to those beings. Through those roots of virtuous action other buddhafiels in which the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are alive at present, [F.248.b] teaching the Dharma of this profound perfection of wisdom, will become manifest, and they will rely on such pure buddhafiels. Having manifestly heard from those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas this profound perfection of wisdom, in those buddhafiels they will also teach it to many hundreds of creatures, many thousands of creatures, and many hundred thousands of creatures for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They will encourage them, incite them, and cause them to rejoice.”

30.75 “Blessed Lord, it is most wonderful that, among the Dharmas of the past, future, and present, there is nothing that is not comprehended by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, no real nature or reality that is not comprehended, and no mind of beings that is not comprehended. For they indeed know the bodhisattvas associated with past tathāgatas, they indeed know the tathāgatas of the past, and they indeed know the buddhafiels and the śrāvakas associated with past tathāgatas. They indeed know the bodhisattvas associated with future tathāgatas, and they indeed know the buddhafiels and the śrāvakas associated with future tathāgatas. They indeed know the bodhisattvas associated with present tathāgatas, and they indeed know the buddhafiels and the śrāvakas associated with present tathāgatas. [F.249.a] They indeed know the bodhisattvas associated with all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma, in the world systems of the ten directions, and they indeed know their buddhafiels and śrāvakas. {Ki.IV: 34}

30.76 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings persevere for the sake of the six perfections and search for and investigate these six perfections, among those noble sons and noble daughters who search for and investigate these six perfections, are there some who will acquire these six perfections after searching for them, and some who will not acquire them?”

30.77 “Śāradvatīputra, that is not the case,” replied the Blessed One. “All those noble sons and noble daughters who do not abandon their perseverance will indeed acquire all these six perfections. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because those noble sons and noble daughters are persevering for the sake of these six perfections.”

30.78 “Blessed Lord, is it the case that those noble sons and noble daughters will also acquire all the utterly profound sūtras that are associated with the six profound perfections?”

30.79 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “it is impossible that those noble sons and noble daughters will not acquire these utterly profound sūtras that are associated with the six profound perfections. That cannot be. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because, even after they have taught them to beings for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, encouraging and inciting them, causing them to rejoice and securing them, [F.249.b] it is the case, Śāradvatīputra, that once those noble sons and noble daughters have passed away, they will yet again acquire these six perfections. Until they have refined the buddhafi elds, brought beings to maturity, and attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they will never slacken in their perseverance that derives from these six perfections, as they have been taught.”

30.80 This completes the thirtieth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 31

31.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if these are the stated attributes of those noble sons and noble daughters who have entered upon unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, who practice the six perfections, and who bring beings to maturity and refine⁴³⁵ the buddhafi elds, then, Blessed Lord, what sorts of obstacles will there be for those noble sons and noble daughters who engage in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?” {Ki.IV: 35}

31.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if inspired speech arises after a very long lapse of time, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this is the work of Māra.”

31.3 “Blessed Lord, for what reason will inspired speech arise after a very long lapse of time? Why should bodhisattva great beings know that this is the work of Māra?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they perfect the perfection of wisdom with difficulty, and if they perfect the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, [F.250.a] the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity with difficulty, for this reason, Subhūti, their inspired speech will arise after an extremely long lapse of time. Bodhisattva great beings should know that this is the work of Māra.

31.4 “Moreover, if their inspired speech arises too quickly, bodhisattva great beings should know that this [also] is the work of Māra.”

31.5 “Blessed Lord, for what reason will inspired speech arise too quickly? Why should bodhisattva great beings know that this is the work of Māra?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, if without skillful means their inspired speech arises too quickly and they give rise to conceits about it, for that reason, Subhūti, their inspired speech arises too quickly and bodhisattva great beings should know this to be the work of Māra.

31.6 “Moreover, Subhūti, if they commit this perfection of wisdom to writing⁴³⁶ while yawning, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. Moreover, Subhūti, if they commit this perfection of wisdom to writing while laughing, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. Subhūti, if they commit this perfection of wisdom to writing while sneering at one another, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. If they commit this perfection of wisdom to writing with a distracted mind, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. [F.250.b] If they commit this perfection of wisdom to writing while being attached to other writings and without understanding the meaning of its words, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. [Ki.IV: 36] If they rise from their seats and go away without having relished this [perfection of wisdom], bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.7 “Moreover, Subhūti, if they yawn while conferring its transmission, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. If they yawn while disseminating, upholding, reciting, or teaching it, or if they yawn while focusing their attention correctly on it, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.8 “Moreover, Subhūti, if they laugh at one another while taking up, upholding, reciting, or mastering this [perfection of wisdom], focusing their attention correctly on it, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. Moreover, Subhūti, if they sneer at one another while taking up, upholding, reciting, or mastering this [perfection of wisdom], focusing their attention correctly on it, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. Moreover, Subhūti, if with distracted minds they take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly [on this perfection of wisdom], bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. Moreover, Subhūti, if with attachment to other writings they take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly [on this perfection of wisdom], bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.”

31.9 The venerable Subhūti then inquired of the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, [F.251.a] you said that if they rise from their seats and go away without having relished this [perfection of wisdom], bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. In that case, Blessed Lord, why would they not have relished it?”

31.10 The Blessed One replied, “It is because bodhisattva great beings who have not previously practiced the perfection of wisdom, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity {Ki.IV: 37} will rise from their seats and go away while this profound perfection of wisdom is being taught, their minds lacking faith, and thinking, ‘We have not been prophesied with regard to this perfection of wisdom!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.”

31.11 “Blessed Lord, why do those who have not been prophesied with regard to this perfection of wisdom rise from their seats and go away?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who have not entered into the maturity [of the bodhisattvas] are not prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If they lack faith, thinking, ‘We do not figure in this perfection of wisdom. Even our names are not mentioned in it!’ then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.”

31.12 “Blessed Lord, why are the names of those bodhisattva great beings not mentioned in this profound perfection of wisdom?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the names of bodhisattva great beings who have not been prophesied are not mentioned. [F.251.b] If they think, ‘Even our names do not figure in this [perfection of wisdom]. Nor does the name of the village, city, or market town where we were born figure in it! We should not listen to the perfection of wisdom! We should depart from this assembly!’ then the more those who have set their minds on enlightenment think they should depart and the more they step away, the more eons of time they will continue to be imprisoned [in cyclic existence], and the more they will have to persevere anew. Having discarded the perfection of wisdom, they will think of mastering those sūtras that do not sustain the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. In this way, those noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have abandoned the roots of the tree of all-aspect omniscience, and think of holding on to its branches, leaves, and foliage. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.”

31.13 “Blessed Lord, what are the sūtras that do not sustain the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience and which they think to master?”

“They are the sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas,” replied the Blessed One, “those that enjoin the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, and the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. Abiding in these, {Ki.IV: 38} noble sons and noble daughters will attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and they will attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, [F.252.a] and individual enlightenment, but they will not attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, these are the sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas that they will think of mastering after discarding the perfection of wisdom, and in which the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience is not sustained. If you ask why, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who have originated from the perfection of wisdom will attain emancipation through mundane and supramundane attributes. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in the perfection of wisdom will train in mundane and supramundane attributes.

31.14 “Subhūti, just as a dog may well spurn food given by its master, and think of looking for a morsel from a servant, in the same way, Subhūti, in the future noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will discard this profound the perfection of wisdom, which is the root of all the attributes of the buddhas. They will think of relying on sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas that resemble branches, leaves, and foliage. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.15 “Moreover, Subhūti, in the future noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will discard this profound perfection of wisdom and think of mastering sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas for the sake of profit and honor. Subhūti, [F.252.b] bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.16 “Subhūti, it is as if some person who wants an elephant, after finding the elephant, were then to think of searching for the tracks of an elephant.⁴³⁷ Subhūti, do you think that this person would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

31.17 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “one should know that those persons who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, who have discarded this profound perfection of wisdom and think of looking for sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, are like that. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. {Ki.IV:39}

31.18 “Subhūti, it is as if someone wishing to see the great ocean were to think of looking for it in the tracks of a bull, and on seeing the hoofprint of a bull were to wonder whether it is the same size as the great ocean or not. Subhūti, do you think that this person would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord! No, O Sugata!”

- 31.19 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “one should know that noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, who, even after finding this profound perfection of wisdom, discard and abandon this profound perfection of wisdom, and think of acquiring and mastering sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, are like that. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. [F.253.a]
- 31.20 “Subhūti, it is as if a builder⁴³⁸ or a builder’s apprentice wished to build a house the size of [Śakra’s divine] Vaijayanta Palace, and were to think of searching for the celestial palace of the sun and moon and then think of taking his measurements from the celestial palace of the sun and moon. Subhūti, do you think that this person could build a house like that, modeling the dimensions of the Vaijayanta Palace on the dimensions of the celestial palace of the sun and moon?”
“No, Blessed Lord!”
- 31.21 “Subhūti, do you think that this builder or builder’s apprentice would be intelligent?” asked the Blessed One.
“Blessed Lord, that person would be known as a simpleton! He would not be intelligent!”
- 31.22 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “in the future, if there are any noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who, even after hearing and finding this profound perfection of wisdom, were to discard and abandon this profound perfection of wisdom, and think of looking for all-aspect omniscience in sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, do you think, Subhūti, that those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas would be intelligent?”
“No, Blessed Lord! No, O Sugata!”
- 31.23 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 31.24 “Subhūti, it is as if someone [F.253.b] wishing to see an imperial monarch were to look upon a regional king, and, thinking him to have a complexion and form similar to that of an imperial monarch, [Ki.IV: 40] were to consider that an imperial monarch would have acquired the marks of complexion and shape to be seen in a regional king, and then say, ‘It seems that the complexion, shape, bearing, and marks of an imperial monarch are similar to those of this earthly ruler.’ Subhūti, do you think that this person would be intelligent?”
“No, Blessed Lord! No, O Sugata!”

31.25 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “in the future, if there are any noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who, even after hearing and finding this profound perfection of wisdom, were to discard and abandon this profound perfection of wisdom, and think of looking for all-aspect omniscience in sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, do you think, Subhūti, that those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

31.26 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.27 “Subhūti, it is as if someone who was extremely hungry, even after finding food with a hundred savors, were to think of looking for food with sixty savors, and, after spurning that food endowed with a hundred savors were to think of eating food with sixty savors. Subhūti, do you think [F.254.a] that this person would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

31.28 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “in the future, if there are any noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who, even after hearing and finding this profound perfection of wisdom, were to discard and abandon this profound perfection of wisdom, and think of looking for all-aspect omniscience in sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, do you think, Subhūti, that those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

31.29 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.30 “Subhūti, it is as if someone, after finding a priceless precious gem, were to think it comparable to quartz. Subhūti, do you think that this person would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

31.31 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “in the future, if there are any noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who, even after hearing and finding this profound perfection of wisdom, were to discard and abandon this profound perfection of wisdom, and think of looking for all-aspect omniscience in sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, [F.254.b] do you think, Subhūti, that those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas would be intelligent?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

31.32 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

31.33 “Moreover, Subhūti, when those noble sons and noble daughters commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, the following will arise to disturb their writing of this profound perfection of wisdom: inspired speech associated with sights; inspired speech associated with sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena; inspired speech associated with generosity; inspired speech associated with ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom; inspired speech associated with the realm of desire; inspired speech associated with the realm of form; inspired speech associated with the realm of formlessness; inspired speech associated with the conferral of transmissions and acts of dissemination; inspired speech associated with acts of service; inspired speech associated with the applications of mindfulness; inspired speech associated with the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the path; inspired speech associated with the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities and the formless absorptions; inspired speech associated with the emptiness of internal phenomena; inspired speech associated with [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; inspired speech associated with the perfection of generosity; inspired speech associated with the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; inspired speech associated with the powers [of the tathāgatas], the fearlessnesses, [F.255.a] the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and inspired speech associated with [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the perfection of wisdom is purified of inspired speech.

31.34 “Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is inconceivable. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is unimaginable. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom neither arises nor ceases. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is neither afflicted nor purified. {Ki.IV: 41} Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is undisturbed. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is inexpressible. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is not to be refined. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is nonapprehensible. If you ask why, Subhūti, these attributes do not exist and are not apprehended in this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, if, when noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, they are disturbed by these attributes, then, Subhūti, those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should know that this too is the work of Māra."

31.35 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, "Blessed Lord, can the perfection of wisdom be committed to writing?"

"No, Subhūti!" replied the Blessed One. "If you ask why, Subhūti, the essential nature of the perfection of wisdom does not exist, and it is not apprehended. [F.255.b] The essential nature of the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity does not exist, and it is not apprehended. The essential nature of all the aspects of emptiness and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment does not exist, and it is not apprehended. The essential nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers does not exist, and it is not apprehended. The essential nature of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways does not exist, and it is not apprehended. The essential nature of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities does not exist, and it is not apprehended. The essential nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, does not exist, and it is not apprehended. That which is a nonapprehensible essential nature is a nonentity. That which is a nonentity is the perfection of wisdom. A nonentity cannot be committed to writing because it is a nonentity.

31.36 "Subhūti, if any noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas perceive that this profound perfection of wisdom is a nonentity, that too should be known as the work of Māra."

31.37 "Blessed Lord, if any noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, after committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, [F.256.a] discern that they themselves have committed this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, then they are attached to of this profound perfection of wisdom as written. Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is unwritten. The perfection of meditative concentration is unwritten. {Ki.IV: 42} The perfection of perseverance is unwritten. The perfection of tolerance is unwritten. The perfection of ethical discipline is unwritten. The perfection of generosity is unwritten.

31.38 "Blessed Lord, physical forms are unwritten. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are unwritten. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are unwritten. The emptiness of internal phenomena is unwritten. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are unwritten. The thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are unwritten. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers are unwritten. The meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways are unwritten. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are unwritten. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are unwritten.

31.39 “Blessed Lord, if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas are attached to the unwritten perfection of wisdom, [F.256.b] and if they are attached to the unwritten perfection of meditative concentration, perfection of perseverance, perfection of tolerance, perfection of ethical discipline, or perfection of generosity; if they are attached to the unwritten emptiness of internal phenomena; if they are attached to the [unwritten other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; if they are attached to the unwritten thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; if they are attached to the [unwritten] truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, eight aspects of liberation, nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers; if they are attached to the [unwritten] meditative stabilities or dhāraṇī gateways; if they are attached to the [unwritten] powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, or distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if they are attached to the unwritten [goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.”

31.40 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” said the Blessed One. “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and disseminate, request, take up, recite, master, focus their attention correctly on it, and cultivate it, if they pay a lot of attention to their country, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings [F.257.a] should know that this too is the work of Māra. [B44]

31.41 “Moreover, Subhūti, when noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and disseminating, requesting, holding, reciting, mastering, cultivating, or focusing their attention correctly on it, if while cultivating it they focus attention on villages, focus attention on market towns, focus attention on nations, focus attention on capital cities, focus attention on households, focus attention on monastic preceptors, focus attention on parents, brothers, sisters, or friends, focus attention on thieves, focus attention on scavengers, focus attention on worldly people, focus attention on prostitutes, or focus attention on women, or if their attention should happen to be focused on all sorts of other matters, then, Subhūti, while they are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and holding, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, or focusing their attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, {Ki.IV: 43} the evil Māra will provoke disturbances in order to make obstacles. Bodhisattva great beings should know that these too are the work of Māra.

31.42 “Moreover, Subhūti, when noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, while they are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and transmitting, disseminating, or focusing their attention correctly on it, [F.257.b] if they should relish profit, honors, words [of praise], religious robes, food, bedding, medicines, or many utensils, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that these too are the work of Māra. Such obstacles will arise while they are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and transmitting, disseminating, or focusing their attention correctly on it.

31.43 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and transmitting, disseminating, cultivating, or focusing their attention correctly on it, the evil Māra will suggest profound sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas that promote the applications of mindfulness, and [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, as well as the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. In that case, noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and who are endowed with skillful means will not be attracted to those profound sūtras suggested by Māra. If you ask why, Subhūti, these are not conducive to the attainment of all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, bodhisattvas who are unskilled in it will think of discarding this profound perfection of wisdom after hearing it, but in it I have extensively revealed skillful means to bodhisattva great beings. Skillful means can indeed be extensively found in this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have discarded this profound perfection of wisdom, and think that skillful means will be found in those sūtras associated with the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.” [F.258.a]

31.44 This completes the thirty-first chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 32

- 32.1 “Moreover, Subhūti, if those who listen to the Dharma delight in committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and in transmitting and disseminating it, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma delay, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.2 “Moreover, Subhūti, {Ki.IV: 44} if those who expound the Dharma do not delay in committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and in transmitting and disseminating it, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma go away to another land, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.3 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and transmit and disseminate it, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma go away to another land, then, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [teachers] who expound the Dharma are interested in profit, honors, and words [of praise], and interested in religious robes, food, bedding, medicines, and utensils, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma have few desires, and are withdrawn into their knowledge of the Dharma,⁴³⁹ energetic, mindful, undistracted, one-pointed, wise, and afraid of profit and honors, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.5 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [teachers] who expound the Dharma have few desires, and are withdrawn into their knowledge of the Dharma,⁴⁴⁰ energetic, mindful, undistracted, one-pointed, wise, and afraid of profit and honors, [F.258.b] but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma have great desires, are attached to evil, and interested in profit, honors, and words [of praise], and interested in religious robes, food, bedding, medicines, and utensils, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.6 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [teachers] who expound the Dharma stay in isolation, beg for alms, wear cast-off clothes, restrict eating [after midday], eat their meal in a single sitting, accept just whatever alms have been obtained, frequent charnel grounds, sit in exposed places, sit under trees, sit upright even during sleep, stay wherever they happen to be, and own only three robes, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not stay in isolation, do not beg for alms, do not wear cast-off clothes, do not restrict eating [after midday], do not eat their meal in a single sitting, do not accept just whatever alms have been obtained, do not frequent charnel grounds, do not sit in exposed places, do not sit under trees, do not sit upright even during sleep, do not stay wherever they happen to be, and do not own only three robes, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. {Ki.IV: 45} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.⁴⁴¹

32.7 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma stay in isolation, and [observe the other ascetic virtues], up to and including the owning of only three robes, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not stay in isolation, and do not [observe the other ascetic virtues], up to and including the owning of only three robes, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.8 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma, endowed with faith and virtuous aspirations, wish to commit this profound perfection of wisdom [F.259.a] to writing, wish to transmit it, and wish that it should be disseminated, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma are faithless, immoral, and evil, do not wish to commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, do not wish to transmit it, and do not wish to disseminate it, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.9 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma, endowed with faith and virtuous aspirations, wish to commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, disseminate it [and so forth], but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma are faithless [and so forth], then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.10 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma give away all that they possess, and their minds are without attachment, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma have minds that are miserly and attached, and are avaricious, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.11 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma give away all that they possess and their minds are without attachment, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma have minds that are miserly and attached, and are avaricious, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings [F.259.b] should know that this too is the work of Māra. {Ki.IV: 46}

32.12 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to give away robes, food, bedding, medicines, and utensils to [teachers] who expound the Dharma, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not wish to receive them, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.13 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma understand it simply through the discourse that has been given, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma require guidance and are interested in verbal [explanations], then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.14 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma understand it simply through the discourse that has been given, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma require guidance and are interested in verbal [explanations], then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

- 32.15 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma understand the doctrinal distinctions between discourses, sayings in prose and verse, prophetic declarations, verses, aphorisms, contexts, quotations, tales of past lives, most extensive teachings, marvelous events, narratives, and established instructions, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not understand the doctrinal distinctions between discourses, sayings in prose and verse, prophetic declarations, verses, aphorisms, contexts, quotations, tales of past lives, most extensive teachings, marvelous events, narratives, and established instructions, [F.260.a] then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. {Ki.IV: 47} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.16 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma understand the doctrinal distinctions between discourses, sayings in prose and verse, prophetic declarations, [and the other branches of the scriptures], up to and including established instructions, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not understand the doctrinal distinctions between discourses, sayings in prose and verse, prophetic declarations, [and the other branches of the scriptures], up to and including established instructions, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.17 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma possess the six perfections, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not possess the six perfections, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.18 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma possess the six perfections, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not possess the six perfections, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.19 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma are skilled in means with regard to the six perfections, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma are not skilled in means with regard to the six perfections, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, great bodhisattva [F.260.b] beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma are skilled in means with regard to the six perfections, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma are not skilled in means with regard to the six perfections, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. {Ki.IV: 48} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.21 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma have obtained the dhāraṇīs, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma have not obtained the dhāraṇīs, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.22 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma have obtained the dhāraṇīs, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma have not obtained the dhāraṇīs, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.23 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma wish to commit this [perfection of wisdom] to writing, wish to recite it, wish to transmit it, wish to disseminate it, and wish to cultivate it, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not wish to commit this [perfection of wisdom] to writing, do not wish to recite it, do not wish to transmit it, do not wish to disseminate it, and do not wish to listen to it, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.24 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to commit this [perfection of wisdom] to writing, wish to listen to it, [and so forth], but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not wish to commit it to writing, do not wish to cultivate it, [and so forth], [F.261.a] then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

- 32.25 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma are free from the craving associated with desire, and are free from malice, apathy, torpor, and agitation, and free from doubt, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma have craving associated with desire, have malice, apathy, torpor, and agitation, and have doubt, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma are free from craving associated with desire, and are free from malice, apathy, torpor, and agitation, and free from doubt, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma have craving associated with desire, have malice, apathy, torpor, and agitation, and have doubt, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. {Ki.IV: 49} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, when they are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting it, transmitting it, disseminating it, and maintaining it, focusing their attention correctly on it, if someone arrives there, and describes how unpleasant the hells are, describes how unpleasant the animal realm, the world of Yama, and the abodes of anguished spirits are, and says, ‘For the denizens of the hells, the suffering is like this. In the animal realm, the suffering is like this. [F.261.b] In the abodes of anguished spirits, the suffering is like this. You should put an end to suffering here and now! What is the point for your attaining unsurpassed, complete enlightenment in the course of which many thousands of sufferings will be experienced! Long have you roamed in cyclic existence!’ then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, when they are committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting it, transmitting it, disseminating it, and maintaining it, focusing their attention correctly on it, if someone arrives there and describes how excellent the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika are, describes how excellent the gods of the Trayastrimśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, and Paranirmitavaśavartin realms are, and describes how excellent the gods of [other realms], up to and including the sense field of neither perception nor nonperception are, and says, ‘The realm of desire has happiness like this owing to the enjoyment of desires. The realm of form has happiness like this owing to the meditative concentrations and the absorptions. The realm of formlessness has happiness like this owing to the formless absorptions. But all these are impermanent, imbued with suffering, and without self. Since they are subject to change, subject to extinction, subject to destruction, subject to arising, and subject to cessation, you should attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa here and now! You should attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship here and now! You should attain individual enlightenment here and now! Henceforth you will not roam within cyclic existence!’ then, Subhūti, [F.262.a] the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.29 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma live alone and do everything by themselves, without a companion, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma live in a community, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.30 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma live alone and do everything by themselves, without a companion, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma live in a community, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.31 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma live alone and do everything by themselves, without a companion, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma gather together, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.32 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma live alone and do everything by themselves, without a companion, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma gather together, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.33 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma say, ‘I will give the perfection of wisdom to anyone who follows me here,’ {Ki.IV: 50} but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not follow, [F.262.b] then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.34 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to follow [the teachers] who expound the Dharma, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not give them an opportunity to approach, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.35 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma, for the sake of trifling material things, wish to have this profound perfection of wisdom committed to writing, wish to have it recited, wish to transmit it, wish to have it disseminated, and wish to expound it, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma are disinclined to approach them for the sake of trifling material things, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.36 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [[the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, and wish to listen to it, [and so forth], for the sake of trifling material things, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not wish to give the perfection of wisdom and do not wish to have them listen to it, [and so forth], for the sake of trifling material things, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.37 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma wish to go to a place where their lives will be endangered, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not wish to go there, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. [F.263.a] Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.38 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to go to a place where their lives will be endangered, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not wish to go there, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

- 32.39 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma wish to go to a place where food is scarce and water is scarce, but [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma do not wish to go there, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.40 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to go to a place where food is scarce and water is scarce, but [the teachers] who expound the Dharma do not wish to go there, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. {Ki.IV: 51} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.41 “Moreover, Subhūti, if [the teachers] who expound the Dharma wish to go to a place where food is abundant and water is abundant, and [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma wish to follow them but [the teachers] say to them, ‘Noble child, why do you think it is a good idea to go there for the sake of material things? Will you not regret doing so for the sake of obtaining food or obtaining alms?’ the teachers who expound the Dharma would indeed refuse the Dharma by a subtle means and the [disciples] would also be disgusted, perceiving that this is not a sign that [the teachers] want to impart [the perfection of wisdom]; rather, it is a sign that they refuse to do so. In that case, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. [F.263.b] Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.42 “Moreover, Subhūti, if monks who expound the Dharma wish to go to a place where there is fear of thieves, fear of robbers, fear of hunters, fear of wild beasts of prey, fear of snakes, and fear of jungle terrain, and [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma follow them for the sake of the Dharma, thirsting for the Dharma, but the monks who expound the Dharma were then to say to those [disciples] who listen to the Dharma, ‘Noble children, why will you go in that place where there is fear of thieves, fear of robbers, fear of hunters, fear of wild beasts of prey, fear of snakes, and fear of jungle terrain?’ those monks who expound the Dharma do not wish to have this perfection of wisdom committed to writing, do not wish to have it recited, do not wish to transmit it, do not wish to have it disseminated, and do not wish to have them hear it because they will not teach the Dharma, and those [disciples], on hearing the words of the monks who expound the scared doctrine, would be disgusted and assume a disgusted demeanor, not wishing to depart for that place where the teachers who expound the Dharma are going. In that case, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.43 “Moreover, Subhūti, if monks who expound the Dharma attach weight to cities that donate alms and think they should go to visit those alms-giving cities repeatedly, and because they visit those places again and again, deter [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma, {Ki.IV: 52} saying, ‘Venerables, I have to visit that alms-giving city. I have to go to that alms-giving city!’ [F.264.a] and [the disciples] who listen to the Dharma are consequently deterred and turn back, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.44 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil Māra will assume the guise of a monk and by whatever means will employ devices so that no one at all will commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmit it, disseminate it, or focus their attention correctly on it.”

32.45 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, why should the evil Māra assume the guise of a monk? In what way will he employ devices so that no one at all will commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmit it, disseminate it, or focus their attention correctly on it?”

32.46 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the evil band of Māra will assume the forms of monks and cause dissension, deterring them and dissuading them with the words, ‘This [doctrine] that we understand is the perfection of wisdom! That which you would recite is not the perfection of wisdom!’ Subhūti, when the evil Māra causes dissension in that manner, bodhisattvas who have not been prophesied will hesitate, and having hesitated, they will not commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, they will not recite it, they will not transmit it, they will not disseminate it, they will not cultivate it, and they will not focus their attention correctly on it. [F.264.b] Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.47 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil band of Māra will assume the forms of monks and approach bodhisattva great beings, saying, ‘Bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom will actualize the very limit of reality. They will attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They will attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship. They will attain individual enlightenment!" Thereupon, after hearing these words, if they do not practice the perfection of wisdom, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. {Ki.IV: 53} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

32.48 "Moreover, Subhūti, when this profound perfection of wisdom is being taught, there will arise many deeds of Māra that cause obstacles. Bodhisattva great beings should know that these deeds of Māra are in fact the work of Māra, and on knowing this, reject them."

32.49 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, "Blessed Lord, what are the deeds of Māra that bodhisattva great beings should know and that they should reject?"

32.50 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "the counterfeits of the perfection of wisdom are the deeds of Māra. The counterfeits of the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and [F.265.a] the perfection of generosity are the deeds of Māra. Bodhisattva great beings should know these.

32.51 "Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that sūtras associated with the vehicle of the śrāvakas and associated with the pratyekabuddhas are also the work of Māra, and should then reject them.

32.52 "Moreover, Subhūti, the evil band of Māra will assume the forms of monks and also induce bodhisattva great beings toward the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of both external and internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, and the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—by which they will attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. If they rejoice in them, then, Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.

- 32.53 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil band of Māra will assume the forms of buddhas with bodies that have a golden complexion, the thirty-two major marks of a great person, and aureoles of light extending a full arm span, and then approach bodhisattva great beings. Bodhisattva great beings will develop devotion to those [illusions], and having developed devotion, they will lapse from [the pursuit of] all-aspect omniscience. [F.265.b] Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra. {Ki.IV:54}
- 32.54 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil band of Māra will exhibit in front of noble sons or noble daughters a community of monks headed by the Buddha. They will develop attachment to this [illusion], saying, ‘In the future may I too come to resemble this tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha! I too should gather an assembly [of monks] like the assembly gathered by this tathāgata! I too should teach the Dharma in the manner in which this tathāgata teaches the Dharma!’ Consequently, they will lapse from [the pursuit of] all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, and disseminating it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.55 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil band of Māra will exhibit many hundreds of bodhisattvas, many thousands of bodhisattvas, many hundred thousands of bodhisattvas practicing the perfection of generosity, and practicing the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Those who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will develop attachment to these [illusory bodhisattvas], and having developed attachment to them, they will lapse from [the pursuit of] all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, [F.266.a] the causes and conditions for committing this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting it, disseminating it, cultivating it, and focussing their attention correctly on it will not be present. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know that this too is the work of Māra.
- 32.56 “If you ask why, in this profound perfection of wisdom, there are no⁴⁴² physical forms. There are no feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. There are no sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. There are no perfections. There are no aspects of emptiness. There are no thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. There are no truths of the noble ones. There are no meditative concentrations. There are no immeasurable attitudes. There are no formless absorptions. There are no eight aspects of liberation. There are no nine serial steps of meditative absorption. There are no gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. There are no extrasensory powers. There are no meditative stabilities. There are no dhāraṇī gateways. There are no ten powers of the tathāgatas. There are no four fearlessnesses. There are no four kinds of exact knowledge. There is no great loving kindness. There is no great compassion. There are no eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. There is no fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. There is no fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment. There is no unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

32.57 “Subhūti, where there are no physical forms; no feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; no sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination; no perfections; no aspects of emptiness; [F.266.b] no thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; no truths of the noble ones; no meditative concentrations; no immeasurable attitudes; no formless absorptions; no eight aspects of liberation; no nine serial steps of meditative absorption; no gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; no extrasensory powers; no meditative stabilities; {Ki.IV: 55} no dhāraṇī gateways; no powers of the tathāgatas; no fearlessnesses; no kinds of exact knowledge; [no great loving kindness]; no great compassion; no distinct qualities of the buddhas; no fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa; no fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth; no fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth; no arhatship or individual enlightenment; and no unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, then there are no buddhas, there are no bodhisattvas, there are no pratyekabuddhas, and there are no śrāvakas. If you ask why, Subhūti, all phenomena are empty of inherent existence.

32.58 “Moreover, Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom will bring up many obstacles. Those noble sons or noble daughters who would commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, transmitting, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, will also encounter obstacles.⁴⁴³ Subhūti, just as all precious things that are highly valued in Jambudvīpa, including gold, gemstones, pearls, beryl, conch, crystal, coral, silver, and fine gold, will bring up many obstacles and much antagonism, in the same way, Subhūti, those noble sons or noble daughters who would commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, [F.267.a] teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, will also encounter many deeds of Māra. They will encounter many obstacles, and they will encounter much antagonism.”

32.59 “Blessed Lord, it is so! Sugata, it is so!” said Subhūti. “All the precious things of this Jambudvīpa that are highly valued, including gold, gemstones, pearls, beryl, conch, crystal, coral, silver, and fine gold, will bring up many obstacles and much antagonism. In the same way, Blessed Lord, those noble sons or noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, will also encounter many deeds of Māra. They will encounter many obstacles, and they will encounter much antagonism. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, the foolish persons who would make obstacles for those noble sons and noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, are under the influence of Māra. Blessed Lord, those foolish persons are of feeble intelligence and weak intelligence. Blessed Lord, those foolish persons who would make obstacles for noble sons and noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, are extremely small-minded. Their minds do not engage with the magnificent attributes of the buddhas. They themselves will not commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing. They will not recite it, they will not transmit it, they will not disseminate it, they will not cultivate it, and they will not focus their attention correctly on it. They will also make obstacles for others who would commit it to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focus their attention correctly on it.” [F.267.b]

32.60 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Those noble sons or noble daughters who do not commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, who do not recite it, do not transmit it, do not disseminate it, do not cultivate it, and do not focus their attention correctly on it, and who make obstacles for others who would commit it to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, are under the influence of Māra. They will have newly entered into the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. They will not have developed the roots of virtuous action. Their roots of virtuous action will be extremely feeble. They will not have attained the roots of virtuous action under the conquerors of the past. They will not have been accepted by a spiritual mentor. Those noble sons and noble daughters are of feeble intelligence and weak intelligence. Those noble sons and noble daughters who do not commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, {Ki.IV: 56} who do not recite it, do not transmit it, do not disseminate it, do not cultivate it, and do not focus their attention correctly on it, and who make obstacles for others who would commit it to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, are extremely small-minded. Their minds do not engage with the magnificent attributes of the buddhas.

32.61 “Subhūti, although those who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it, will encounter these deeds of Māra, even so, Subhūti, if there are noble sons or noble daughters who do commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, and focusing their attention correctly on it, and if, in addition, they do perfect the perfection of meditative concentration; if they do perfect the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; [F.268.a] if they do perfect all the aspects of emptiness; if they do perfect the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; if they do perfect the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if they do perfect knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience, then, Subhūti, you should know that this is the power of the buddhas.

32.62 “So it is that noble sons and noble daughters commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, and focusing their attention correctly on it. They perfect this profound perfection of wisdom, and in addition they perfect all [the other] perfections. They perfect all the aspects of emptiness, and they perfect the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, [F.268.b] the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. All those lord buddhas of the ten directions who are alive at present also direct their enlightened intention toward noble sons and noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it. All those bodhisattva great beings of the ten directions who are irreversible also accept and make efforts on behalf of noble sons and noble daughters who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, teaching, and focusing their attention correctly on it.⁴⁴⁴ [B45]

32.63 “Subhūti, it is just as if there were a woman with five children, or with ten, {Ki.IV: 57} twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, one hundred, or one thousand children—they would strive by any means to ensure that their mother would not fall ill and they would attend to their mother with excellent acts of service, saying, ‘May this mother of ours by whatever means be free from ill health! May this mother of ours by whatever means be without obstacles! May this mother of ours by whatever means live a long life! May this mother of ours by whatever means be without feelings of physical discomfort! She is the one who has given birth to us! She is the giver of life!’ They would honor her with excellent honors, saying, ‘May her life be free from obstacles!’⁴⁴⁵ May her body be free from frailty! May her body not suffer the discomfort of being stung by mosquitoes, flies, or snakes! [F.269.a] May she not suffer discomfort due to heat, cold, hunger, or thirst!’ They would always serve, honor, and greatly venerate her, with all comforting amenities, saying, ‘She is the one who gave birth to us! She is the one who teaches us about this world!’ In the same way, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas also see and direct their enlightened intention uninterruptedly toward this profound perfection of wisdom with their buddha eye at all times. If you ask why, they always see and direct their enlightened intention toward this perfection of wisdom, saying, ‘She gives birth to all our buddha attributes. She reveals this world to us!’ All the buddhas, too, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are alive at present in all the realms of the ten directions, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, and who are teaching the Dharma, also uninterruptedly see this profound perfection of wisdom at all times with their buddha eye and direct their enlightened intention toward her at all times. If you ask why, she is the one who gives birth to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. She is the one who reveals this wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. So it is that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas uninterruptedly see this profound perfection of wisdom at all times with their buddha eye and direct their enlightened intention toward her at all times.

32.64 “If you ask why, there originate from her the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, [F.269.b] and the perfection of generosity, which the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have. There originate from her the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, and [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. There originate from her the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. There originate from her the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, and the eight aspects of liberation. There originate from her the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. There originate from her those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, those who are destined for only one more rebirth, those who are no longer subject to rebirth, arhats, pratyekabuddhas, and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. {Ki.IV:58}

32.65 “Subhūti, all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all those who will attain consummate buddhahood, and all those who are attaining consummate buddhahood, have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, will attain consummate buddhahood, [F.270.a] and are attaining consummate buddhahood dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, at all times the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas uninterruptedly see with their buddha eye and direct their enlightened intention toward all those noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and who commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, reciting, transmitting, disseminating, cultivating, and focusing their attention correctly on it. Subhūti, by all means and at all times the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas will uninterruptedly protect those noble sons and noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas from lapsing from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

32.66 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, you have said that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas and that the perfection of wisdom reveals the world. Blessed Lord, how does the perfection of wisdom give birth to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas? Blessed Lord, how does the perfection of wisdom reveal the world? Blessed Lord, how has the Tathāgata been given birth by the perfection of wisdom? What is the world of which the Tathāgata speaks?”

32.67 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this perfection of wisdom gives birth to the ten powers of the tathāgatas. She gives birth to the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [F.270.b] [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, it is on the basis of these attributes that a tathāgata is designated. So it is, Subhūti, that this profound perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas.”

32.68 “Blessed Lord, what is the world of which the tathāgatas speak?”

“Subhūti, the five aggregates are the world of which the tathāgatas speak,” replied the Blessed One.

32.69 “Blessed Lord, how are the five aggregates revealed by the profound perfection of wisdom? Blessed Lord, how does the perfection of wisdom reveal the five aggregates?”

32.70 The Blessed One replied, “The perfection of wisdom does not reveal that these five aggregates are perishable. She does not reveal that they are very perishable. She does not reveal that they arise. {Ki.IV:59} She does not reveal that they cease. She does not reveal that they are afflicted, that they are purified, that they increase, that they decrease, that they are accepted, that they are rejected, that they are past, that they are future, or that they are present. If you ask why, emptiness is not perishable, or very perishable. Signlessness is not perishable, or very perishable. Wishlessness is not perishable, or very perishable. The unconditioned is not perishable, or very perishable. Nonarising is not perishable, or very perishable. Nonentities are not perishable, or very perishable. The lack of inherent existence is not perishable, or very perishable. Subhūti, it is in this way that the tathāgatas speak of the perfection of wisdom revealing the world.

32.71 “Subhūti, those who know the minds and conduct of immeasurable, countless, and inestimable beings do so dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, [F.271.a] in this profound perfection of wisdom there are no beings. Nothing designated as a being is apprehended. There are no physical forms. Nothing designated as a physical form is apprehended. There are no feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. Nothing designated as consciousness [and so forth] is apprehended. There are no eyes, there are no sights, there is no visual consciousness, there is no visually compounded sensory contact, and there are no feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact. Nothing designated as the eyes is apprehended. Nothing designated as sights is apprehended. Nothing designated as visual consciousness is apprehended. Nothing designated as visually compounded sensory contact is apprehended. Nothing designated as feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact is apprehended. There are no ears, there are no sounds, there is no nose, there are no odors, there is no tongue, there are no tastes, there is no body, there are no tangibles, there is no mental faculty, there are no mental phenomena, there is no mental consciousness [and so forth], there is no mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and there are no feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth]. Nothing designated as mental consciousness [and so forth] is apprehended. Nothing designated as mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth] is apprehended. Nothing designated as feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth] is apprehended.

32.72 “There are no links of dependent origination. There are no perfections. There are no aspects of emptiness. There are no factors conducive to enlightenment. There are no truths of the noble ones. There are no meditative concentrations. There are no immeasurable attitudes. There are no formless absorptions. There are no eight aspects of liberation. There are no nine serial steps of meditative absorption. There are no gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. There are no extrasensory powers. There are no meditative stabilities. There are no dhāraṇī gateways. There are no powers of the tathāgatas. [F.271.b] There are no fearlessnesses. There are no kinds of exact knowledge. [There is no great loving kindness]. There is no great compassion. There are no distinct qualities of the buddhas. There are no [goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Nothing designated as all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is apprehended. Subhūti, it is in this way that this profound perfection of wisdom reveals the world to the tathāgatas, That is to say, this profound perfection of wisdom does not reveal physical forms. She does not reveal feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. She does not reveal [the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, Subhūti, if even the perfection of wisdom itself does not exist and is not apprehended in the perfection of wisdom itself, how could physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness exist and be apprehended? How could [the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience exist and be apprehended? {Ki.IV: 60}

32.73 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of all those who are designated as beings, be they with or without physical form, with or without perception, or with neither perception nor nonperception, in this world system and in the world systems of all the ten directions. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings, it is the case, Subhūti, that the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings through reality itself.” [F.272.a]

32.74 “Blessed Lord, through what reality do the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings through that reality in which even reality itself is not apprehended, let alone the collected and diffused thoughts [of beings]!”

32.75 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings, it is the case, Subhūti, that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings as aspects of the extinction of contaminants. Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings as aspects of nonattachment, cessation, and rejection. Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings as aspects of peace and voidness. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the collected and diffused thoughts of those beings. [F.272.b]

32.76 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings who are afflicted with desire are thoughts afflicted with desire. They correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings who are free from desire are thoughts free from desire. They correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings afflicted with hatred are thoughts afflicted with hatred. They correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings who are free from hatred are thoughts free from hatred. They correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings afflicted with delusion are thoughts afflicted with delusion. {Ki.IV: 61} They correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings who are free from delusion are thoughts free from delusion.”

32.77 “Blessed Lord, how do the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings who are afflicted with desire are thoughts afflicted with desire? How do they correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of beings afflicted with hatred and afflicted with delusion are thoughts afflicted with [hatred and] delusion?”

32.78 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “thoughts that are afflicted with desire are not the genuine and definitive reality of thought. If you ask why, Subhūti, mind is not apprehensible as genuine and definitive reality. If phenomena that originate from the mind are nonapprehensible, how could thoughts that are afflicted with desire or free from desire possibly be apprehended!

32.79 “Subhūti, thoughts that are afflicted with hatred are not the genuine and definitive reality of thought. If you ask why, Subhūti, [F.273.a] thought is not apprehensible as genuine and definitive reality. If phenomena that originate from the mind are nonapprehensible, how could thoughts that are afflicted with hatred or free from hatred possibly be apprehended!

32.80 “Subhūti, thoughts that are afflicted with delusion are not the genuine and definitive reality of thought. If you ask why, Subhūti, thought is not apprehensible as genuine and definitive reality. If phenomena that originate from the mind are nonapprehensible, how could thoughts that are afflicted with delusion or free from delusion possibly be apprehended!

32.81 “Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this perfection of wisdom, that the thoughts of those beings that are afflicted with desire are thoughts afflicted with desire. They correctly and definitively know that thoughts afflicted with hatred are thoughts afflicted with hatred. They correctly and definitively know that thoughts afflicted with delusion are thoughts afflicted with delusion.

32.82 “Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings that are free from desire are thoughts free from desire, in this case, Subhūti, thoughts that are free from desire constitute neither a state of thought with desire, nor a state [of thought] without desire.⁴⁴⁶ If you ask why, Subhūti, there is no association and no meeting of two sorts of thought. Subhūti, it is in this manner that the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings that are free from desire are thoughts free from desire.

32.83 “Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings that are free from hatred are thoughts free from hatred, in this case, Subhūti, thoughts that are free from hatred [F.273.b] constitute neither a state of thought with hatred, nor a state of thought without hatred. If you ask why, Subhūti, there is no association and no meeting of two sorts of thought. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings that are free from hatred are thoughts free from hatred.

- 32.84 “Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings that are free from delusion are thoughts free from delusion, in this case, Subhūti, thoughts that are free from delusion constitute neither a state of thought with delusion, nor a state of thought without delusion. If you ask why, Subhūti, there is no association and no meeting of two sorts of thought. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know that the thoughts of those beings that are free from delusion are thoughts free from delusion.
- 32.85 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the extensive thoughts of other beings and other persons are extensive thoughts. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the extensive thoughts of other beings and other persons are extensive thoughts, in that case, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas know that the thoughts of other beings and of other persons do not increase and their thoughts do not decrease. Their thoughts are not enhanced and their thoughts are not diminished. Their thoughts do not come and their thoughts do not go. Because they are nonentities, thoughts neither increase nor decrease, [F.274.a] they are neither enhanced nor diminished, and they neither come nor go. {Ki.IV: 62} If you ask why, it is because thoughts are without any essential nature by which they could be increased or decreased, be enhanced or diminished, or come or go. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas know this profound perfection of wisdom. They correctly and definitively know that the extensive thoughts of other beings and other persons are extensive thoughts.
- 32.86 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the grand thoughts of other beings and of other persons are grand thoughts. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the grand thoughts of other beings and other persons are grand thoughts, in that case, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not see that the thoughts of other beings and of other persons come or go. They do not see that they arise or cease, or are either stable or fluctuating. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because thoughts are without any essential nature by which they could come or go, arise or cease, or be stable or fluctuating. [F.274.b] Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the grand thoughts of other beings and other persons are grand thoughts.

32.87 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this perfection of wisdom, that the immeasurable thoughts of other beings and of other persons are immeasurable thoughts. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this perfection of wisdom, that the immeasurable thoughts of other beings and other persons are immeasurable thoughts, in that case, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not observe that the thoughts of other beings and of other persons are stable, and do not observe that they are they are unstable, accomplished, or established. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the continuum of thought is without support and immeasurable; there is no support on which the continua of thought could be stabilized. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this perfection of wisdom, that the immeasurable thoughts of other beings and other persons are immeasurable thoughts. {Ki.IV: 63}

32.88 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this perfection of wisdom, [F.275.a] that the undefinable thoughts of other beings and of other persons are undefinable thoughts. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the undefinable thoughts of other beings and other persons are undefinable thoughts, in that case, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know that thoughts without defining characteristics are thoughts without defining characteristics, owing to the emptiness of their own defining characteristics. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the undefinable thoughts of other beings and other persons are undefinable thoughts.

32.89 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the imperceptible thoughts of other beings and of other persons are imperceptible thoughts. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, that the imperceptible thoughts of other beings and other persons are imperceptible thoughts, in that case, Subhūti, those thoughts of other beings and of other persons do not appear to the five eyes of the tathāgatas. Subhūti, it is in that manner that, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas [F.275.b] correctly and definitively know that the imperceptible thoughts of other beings and other persons are imperceptible thoughts.

32.90 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, the thoughts of other beings and of other persons that are diffused or absorbed, and expansive or narrow. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, the thoughts of other beings and other persons that are diffused or absorbed, and expansive or narrow, in that case, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas know those thoughts of other beings and of other persons, in the sense that all the diffused or absorbed, expansive or narrow thoughts of other beings and other persons that arise and appear do so dependent on physical forms, and dependent on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions and consciousness. {Ki.IV: 64} Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, the thoughts of other beings and other persons that are diffused or absorbed, and expansive or narrow.

32.91 “In this regard, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas know the diffused and absorbed, or expansive and narrow thoughts of other beings and other persons in the following manner: With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are permanent; [F.276.a] all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are impermanent; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are both permanent and impermanent; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are neither permanent nor impermanent; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are finite; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness.

With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are infinite; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are both finite and infinite; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the self and the world are neither finite nor infinite; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. {Ki.IV: 65} With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the body possesses life; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms [F.276.b] and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that life is one thing and the body another; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notion ‘it is true that the tathāgatas exist after death; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. With regard to the notions ‘it is true that the tathāgatas do not exist after death; that the tathāgatas both exist and do not exist after death, or that they neither exist nor not exist after death; and that the tathāgatas will neither continue to exist after death, nor will they not continue to exist after death; all else is nonsensical,’ they know that this refers to physical forms and that this refers to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Subhūti, it is in that manner that, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas correctly and definitively know the thoughts of other beings and other persons that are diffused or absorbed, and expansive or narrow.

32.92 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas perceive physical forms through this profound perfection of wisdom. If you ask how they perceive physical forms, they perceive them as the real nature, the unmistakable real nature, unchanging, nonconceptual, signless, effortless, unelaborate, and nonapprehensible. They perceive feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. If you ask how they perceive consciousness [and so forth], they perceive them as the real nature, the unmistakable real nature, unchanging, nonconceptual, signless, effortless, unelaborate, and nonapprehensible. [F.277.a] Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas definitively know, dependent on this profound perfection of wisdom, the real nature of the thoughts of other beings and other persons that are diffused or absorbed, and expansive or narrow, and that they definitively know their unmistakable real nature—unchanging, nonconceptual, signless, effortless, unelaborate, and nonapprehensible.

32.93 “So it is that the real nature of diffused or absorbed, and expansive or narrow [thoughts] is the real nature of the aggregates. The real nature of the aggregates is the real nature of the sense fields. The real nature of the sense fields is the real nature of the sensory elements. The real nature of the sensory elements is the real nature of the links of dependent origination. The real nature of the links of dependent origination is the real nature of all phenomena. The real nature of all phenomena is the real nature of the six perfections. The real nature of the six perfections is the real nature of all the aspects of emptiness. The real nature of all the aspects of emptiness is the real nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. The real nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment is the real nature of the four meditative concentrations. The real nature of the four meditative concentrations is the real nature of the four immeasurable attitudes. The real nature of the four immeasurable attitudes is the real nature of the four formless absorptions. The real nature of the four formless absorptions is the real nature of the five extrasensory powers. The real nature of the five extrasensory powers is the real nature of the eight aspects of liberation. {Ki.IV: 66} The real nature of the eight aspects of liberation is the real nature of the nine serial steps of meditative absorption. [F.277.b] The real nature of the nine serial steps of meditative absorption is the real nature of the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. The real nature of the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—is the real nature of the ten powers of the tathāgatas. The real nature of the ten powers of the tathāgatas is the real nature of the four fearlessnesses. The real nature of the four fearlessnesses is the real nature of the four kinds of exact knowledge. The real nature of the four kinds of exact knowledge is the real nature of great loving kindness. The real nature of great loving kindness is the real nature of great compassion. The real nature of great compassion is the real nature of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. The real nature of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is the real nature of all-aspect omniscience. The real nature of all-aspect omniscience is the real nature of virtuous phenomena. The real nature of virtuous phenomena is the real nature of nonvirtuous phenomena. The real nature of nonvirtuous phenomena is the real nature of mundane phenomena. The real nature of mundane phenomena is the real nature of supramundane phenomena. The real nature of supramundane phenomena is the real nature of contaminated phenomena. The real nature of contaminated phenomena is the real nature of uncontaminated phenomena. The real nature of uncontaminated phenomena is the real nature of past, future, and present phenomena. The real nature of past, future, and present phenomena is the real nature of conditioned and unconditioned phenomena. [F.278.a] The real nature of conditioned and unconditioned phenomena is the real nature of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. The real nature of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is the real nature of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth. The real nature of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth is the real nature of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth. The real nature of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth is the real nature of the fruit of arhatship. The real nature of arhatship is the real nature of individual enlightenment. The real nature of individual enlightenment is the real nature of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment {Ki.IV: 67} is the real nature of the tathāgatas. The real nature of the tathāgatas is the singular real nature, the undifferentiated real nature. The undifferentiated real nature is inexhaustible, and because it is inexhaustible, it is not two things, and cannot be divided into two.

32.94 “Subhūti, this is the real nature of all phenomena, with regard to which the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood dependent on this perfection of wisdom. So it is in that way, Subhūti, that this profound perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas and reveals this world to them. Subhūti, it is in that manner that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas understand the real nature of all phenomena, and understand the unmistakable real nature and the one and only real nature. It is owing to this real nature that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are so named.”

32.95 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, this real nature of all phenomena, unmistakable real nature, and one and only real nature is profound. [F.278.b] Blessed Lord, it is owing to this real nature of all phenomena, unmistakable real nature, and one and only real nature that the enlightenment of the lord buddhas is expressed and described. Blessed Lord, except for bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible, persons of excellent view, and arhats whose contaminants are exhausted, who else will be devoted to this? Blessed Lord, it is after tathāgatas have attained manifest buddhahood that these extremely profound realities are declared to beings.”

32.96 “So it is, Subhūti, that the real nature is inexhaustible,” replied the Blessed One. “If you ask why it is inexhaustible, it is because all phenomena are inexhaustible. It is after the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment that this real nature is declared to beings. Such is the real nature of all phenomena.”

32.97 This completes the thirty-second chapter from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

- 33.1 Then all the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and inhabiting the realm of form, within this world system of the great trichiliocosm, as many as there were, scattered divine sandalwood powder. Approaching the place where the Blessed One was, they prostrated with their heads toward the feet of the Blessed One, and stood to one side. Then, even as they stood to one side, all the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and inhabiting the realm of form, as many as there were, asked the Blessed One, "With regard to this profound perfection of wisdom that the Blessed Lord is explaining, what, Blessed Lord, are the defining characteristics of the profound perfection of wisdom?"
- 33.2 "Divine princes," replied the Blessed One, "this profound perfection of wisdom [F.279.a] has the defining characteristic of emptiness. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of signlessness. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of wishlessness. {Ki.IV: 68} Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonconditioning. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonarising. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of noncessation. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonaffliction. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonpurification. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonentity. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of essencelessness. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of the essential nature of nonentities. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nondwelling. Divine princes, this profound perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of space.

- 33.3 “Divine princes, although this profound perfection of wisdom has such defining characteristics, the tathāgatas have expressed it in worldly conventional terms, but that is not the case in ultimate truth. Divine princes, these defining characteristics cannot be altered by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. If you ask why, it is because the world with its gods, humans, and asuras is also endowed with those very same defining characteristics. Divine princes, defining characteristics do not alter defining characteristics. Defining characteristics do not cognize defining characteristics. Defining characteristics do not cognize the absence of defining characteristics. The absence of defining characteristics does not cognize the absence of defining characteristics. Therefore, as far as defining characteristics, absence of defining characteristics, [F.279.b] both the presence and absence of defining characteristics, and neither the presence nor absence of defining characteristics are concerned, it is impossible for them to be known by anyone, for any of them to be known, or for them to know anything.
- 33.4 “Divine princes, these defining characteristics have not been conditioned by physical forms. They have not been conditioned by feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They have not been conditioned by the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. They have not been conditioned by the perfection of generosity. They have not been conditioned by the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They have not been conditioned by the aspects of emptiness. They have not been conditioned by the factors conducive to enlightenment. They have not been conditioned by the truths of the noble ones. They have not been conditioned by the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They have not been conditioned by [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.
- 33.5 “Divine princes, these defining characteristics are neither human nor nonhuman; they are neither contaminated nor are they uncontaminated; they are neither mundane, nor are they supramundane; and they are neither conditioned, nor are they unconditioned.
- 33.6 “Divine princes, {Ki.IV: 69} if someone were to ask what is the defining characteristic of space, would they be speaking correctly?”

- 33.7 “Blessed Lord, they would not be speaking correctly. [F.280.a] If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because space, insofar as it is unconditioned, is not endowed with any defining characteristic whatsoever.”
- 33.8 “Divine princes,” continued the Blessed One, “whether the tathāgatas have appeared or whether the tathāgatas have not appeared [in the world], the expanse that is without defining characteristics dwells in that manner. The tathāgatas are called tathāgatas because they have unerringly attained consummate buddhahood.”
- 33.9 Then those gods inhabiting the realm of desire and inhabiting the realm of form said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, the tathāgatas engage in the perception of wisdom that is unobstructed with respect to all phenomena because they have attained consummate buddhahood with regard to those defining characteristics. It is having entered into these defining characteristics that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have attained consummate buddhahood with regard to this perfection of wisdom that transcends attachment to all defining characteristics, and, even after attaining consummate buddhahood, they continue to reveal these defining characteristics by revealing the perfection of wisdom. Such are the profound defining characteristics with respect to which the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood.
- 33.10 “Blessed Lord, how wonderful is this profound perfection of wisdom within the perceptual range of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, by engaging in which the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and even after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they continue to distinguish between all defining characteristics! In this manner they distinguish between the defining characteristics of physical forms, [F.280.b] the defining characteristics of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, the defining characteristics of the sense fields, the defining characteristics of the sensory elements, the defining characteristics of the links of dependent origination, and the defining characteristics of [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience!”
- 33.11 The Blessed One then said to the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and those inhabiting the realm of form, “Divine princes, physical forms have the defining characteristic of being perishable, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of this defining characteristic. Similarly, feelings have the defining characteristic of emotional experience, perceptions have the defining characteristic of comprehensibility, formative predispositions have the defining characteristic - of conditioning, and consciousness has the defining characteristic of awareness of particularities, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of these defining characteristics.

- 33.12 “The aggregates have the defining characteristic of suffering, the sensory elements have the defining characteristic of being present, and the sense fields have the defining characteristic of being the sensory gates for the arising [of perception], but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of these defining characteristics. The links of dependent origination have the defining characteristics of absorption and diffusion, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of these defining characteristics.
- 33.13 “Divine princes, the perfection of generosity has the defining characteristic of renunciation, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of this defining characteristic. The perfection of ethical discipline has the defining characteristic of noninvolvement, the perfection of tolerance has the defining characteristic of imperturbability, the perfection of perseverance has the defining characteristic of invincibility, the perfection of meditative concentration has the defining characteristic of total focus, and the perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonattachment, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of these defining characteristics. [F.281.a]
- 33.14 “The four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions have the defining characteristic of nondisturbance, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of that defining characteristic. {Ki.IV: 70} The thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment have the defining characteristic of emancipation, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of that defining characteristic. Emptiness as a gateway to liberation has the defining characteristic of voidness, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of that defining characteristic. Signlessness as a gateway to liberation has the defining characteristic of quiescence, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of this defining characteristic. Wishlessness as a gateway to liberation has the defining characteristic of alleviating suffering,⁴⁴⁷ but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of this defining characteristic. The aspects of liberation have the defining characteristic of release, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of this defining characteristic. The powers [of the tathāgatas] have the defining characteristic of absolute definitiveness, the four fearlessnesses have the defining characteristic of absolute stability, the kinds of exact knowledge have the defining characteristic of nonseverance, great loving kindness has the defining characteristic of being beneficial, great compassion has the defining characteristic of being protective, great empathetic joy has the defining characteristic of being joyful, great equanimity has the defining characteristic of being untainted, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas have the defining characteristic of noncaptivation, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of these defining characteristics. The wisdom of all-aspect omniscience has the defining characteristic of being directly perceived, but the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of this defining characteristic. So it is, divine princes, that because the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to the absence of the defining characteristics of all phenomena, [F.281.b] the tathāgatas are said to have wisdom without attachment.”

33.15 Then the Blessed One addressed the venerable Subhūti: “Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas. The perfection of wisdom reveals the world to them. Therefore, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas act in dependence on this Dharma of the perfection of wisdom. They serve and worship that Dharma. The perfection of wisdom has attributes that the tathāgatas serve, venerate, respect, and worship. If you ask why, Subhūti, the lord buddhas have originated from this perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas appreciate that. The tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are thankful for that. Subhūti, as someone who truly expresses appreciation and thankfulness, to say truly that the tathāgatas appreciate it and that they are thankful for it is indeed to speak truly. Subhūti, if you ask how the tathāgatas appreciate it and are thankful for it, it is, Subhūti, because the tathāgatas serve, respect, honor, worship, and protect that very vehicle by which the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas reach, and that very path by which they attain, consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. In this sense, Subhūti, it should be recognized that the tathāgatas appreciate it and are thankful for it. {Ki.IV:71}

33.16 “Moreover, Subhūti, the tathāgatas [F.282.a] have attained consummate buddhahood [knowing], contingent on the signlessness of all phenomena, that all phenomena are uncreated because there is no agent. They have attained consummate buddhahood [knowing] that [all phenomena] are uncreated because they have no corporeality. So it is, Subhūti, that the tathāgatas have attained consummate buddhahood dependent on the profound perfection of wisdom, [knowing] that all phenomena are inactive. This is the appreciation and thankfulness of the tathāgatas.

- 33.17 “Moreover, Subhūti, it is dependent on this perfection of wisdom that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas symbolically engage with the uncreated wisdom, which does not engage with anything. This is the formulation, Subhūti, that explains how this perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals this world to them.”
- 33.18 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if there is no knowing and no perceiving of any phenomena, how then does the perfection of wisdom give birth to the tathāgatas, and reveal this world to them?”
- 33.19 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “There is no knowing and no perceiving of any phenomena. Subhūti, all phenomena are empty, vacuous, hollow, powerless, and essenceless. This is the formulation, Subhūti, that explains how there is no knowing and no perceiving of any phenomena.
- 33.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, regarding there being no knowing and no perceiving of any phenomena: Subhūti, if you ask how there is no knowing and no perceiving of any phenomena, it is the case, Subhūti, that all phenomena are nondwelling and noninclusive. This formulation, Subhūti, explains how there is no knowing and no perceiving of any phenomena. Subhūti, so it is that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals this world to them.
- 33.21 “‘It also reveals the world because there is no perceiving of physical forms. It reveals the world because there is no perceiving of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. [F.282.b] It reveals the world because there is no perceiving of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. It reveals the world because there is no perceiving of [any of the attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.”
- 33.22 “Blessed Lord, how is it that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of physical forms? How is it that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness? How is it that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination? How is it that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of [any of the attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?” [B46]
- 33.23 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is when there is no consciousness arising that apprehends physical forms that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of physical forms. It is when there is no consciousness arising that apprehends feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of consciousness [or the other aggregates]. {Ki.IV: 72} It is when there is no consciousness arising that apprehends the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. It is when there is no consciousness arising that apprehends the perfections that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of the perfections. It is when there is no consciousness arising that apprehends all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and [F.283.a] wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [or the other causal and fruitional attributes]. It is when there is no consciousness arising that apprehends [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience that it reveals the world because there is no perceiving of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. So it is, Subhūti, that this profound perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.

- 33.24 “Moreover, Subhūti, if you ask in what way the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them, in this case, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom expressly states that in the world phenomena are empty. If you ask what it expressly states in the world to be empty, it expressly states that in the world the five aggregates are empty. It expressly states that in the world the twelve sense fields are empty. It expressly states that in the world the eighteen sensory elements are empty. It expressly states that in the world the twelve links of dependent origination are empty. It expressly states that in the world the six perfections are empty. It expressly states that in the world the emptiness of internal phenomena is empty. It expressly states that in the world [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are empty. It expressly states that in the world the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty. It expressly states that in the world the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and [F.283.b] wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty. It expressly states that in the world [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty. So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them. {Ki.IV:73}

33.25 “Moreover, Subhūti, when the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is empty, it expressly states that the world is empty and makes it known that the world is empty. So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.

33.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is empty. If you ask how it reveals that the world is empty, it reveals that in the world the aggregates are empty. It reveals that in the world the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty. It reveals that in the world the six perfections, the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty. It reveals that in the world the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty. It reveals that in the world the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, [F.284.a] the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty. It reveals that in the world [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty. So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.

33.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is inconceivable. If you ask how it reveals that the world is inconceivable, it reveals that the world comprising the aggregates is inconceivable. It reveals that the world comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is inconceivable. It reveals that the world comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is inconceivable.

- 33.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, this profound perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is void. If you ask how it reveals that the world is void, it reveals that the world comprising the aggregates is void. It reveals that the world comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is void. It reveals that the world comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is void. So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.
- 33.29 “Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that infinite worlds are empty. If you ask how it reveals that infinite worlds are empty, it reveals that infinite worlds comprising the aggregates are empty. It reveals that infinite worlds comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty. It reveals that infinite worlds comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty. [F.284.b]
- 33.30 “Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is empty of essential nature. If you ask how it reveals that the world is empty of essential nature, it reveals that the world comprising the aggregates is empty of essential nature. It reveals that the world comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is empty of essential nature. It reveals that the world comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is empty of essential nature. So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.
- 33.31 “Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is empty of the essential nature of nonentities. If you ask how it reveals that the world is empty of the essential nature of nonentities, it reveals that the world comprising the aggregates is empty of the essential nature of nonentities. It reveals that the world comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is empty of the essential nature of nonentities. It reveals that the world comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is empty of the essential nature of nonentities.
- 33.32 “Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is at peace. If you ask how it reveals that the world is at peace, it reveals that the world comprising the aggregates is at peace. It reveals that the world comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is at peace. It reveals that the world comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is at peace.

- 33.33 “Moreover, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom reveals to the tathāgatas that the world is emptiness. If you ask how it reveals that the world is emptiness, it reveals that the world comprising the aggregates is emptiness. It reveals that the world comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is emptiness. [F.285.a] It reveals that the world comprising [all the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is emptiness. {Ki.IV: 74} So it is, Subhūti, that the perfection of wisdom gives birth to the tathāgatas, and reveals the world to them.
- 33.34 “Subhūti, if you ask how this profound perfection of wisdom reveals the world to them, it reveals in all ways that there are no notions of this world and there are no notions of other worlds. If you ask why, it is because the sort of phenomena that would bring about notions of this world and notions of other worlds do not exist.”
- 33.35 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for a great purpose. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for an inconceivable purpose. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for an inestimable purpose. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for an unappraisable purpose. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for a purpose that is equal to the unequaled.”
- 33.36 “It is so, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. “This perfection of wisdom is established for a great purpose. Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom is established for an inconceivable purpose, an inestimable purpose, an unappraisable purpose, and a purpose that is equal to the unequaled.
- 33.37 “Subhūti, if you ask how the perfection of wisdom is established for a great purpose, this, Subhūti, denotes the great purpose of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas—the purpose of granting refuge to all beings and the purpose of not forsaking any beings.
- 33.38 “Subhūti, [F.285.b] if you ask how the perfection of wisdom is established for an inconceivable purpose, it is the case, Subhūti, that buddhahood, the nature of the tathāgata, self-origination, and all-aspect omniscience are inconceivable. For this reason, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is established for the inconceivable purpose of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas.
- 33.39 “Subhūti, if you ask how the perfection of wisdom is established for an inestimable purpose, Subhūti, there is no one whosoever within the classes of beings who can conceive of or estimate buddhahood, the nature of the tathāgata, self-origination, or all-aspect omniscience. For this reason, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is established for the inestimable purpose of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas.

- 33.40 “Subhūti, if you ask how the perfection of wisdom is established for an unappraisable purpose, Subhūti, buddhahood, the nature of the tathāgata, self-origination, and all-aspect omniscience are unappraisable. There is no one whosoever who can evaluate them. For this reason, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is established for the unappraisable purpose of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. {Ki.IV:75}
- 33.41 “Subhūti, if you ask how the perfection of wisdom is established for a purpose that is equal to the unequaled, Subhūti, no one at all is equal to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, let alone surpasses them! For this reason, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is established for the purpose of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas that is equal to the unequaled.” [F.286.a]
- 33.42 “Blessed Lord, are buddhahood, the nature of the tathāgatas, self-origination, and all-aspect omniscience inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled?”
- 33.43 “It is so, Subhūti. It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, buddhahood, the nature of the tathāgatas, self-origination, and all-aspect omniscience are inconceivable. Subhūti, buddhahood, the nature of the tathāgatas, self-origination, and all-aspect omniscience are inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled.
- 33.44 “Subhūti, physical forms are also inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are also inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are also inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are also inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, all phenomena are also inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, the reality of all phenomena is that the mind is not apprehended, nor are mental states apprehended.
- 33.45 “Subhūti, physical forms, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, are indeed not apprehended. Subhūti, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, are indeed not apprehended. Subhūti, the sense fields, [F.286.b] the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, are indeed not - apprehended. Subhūti, [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, are indeed not apprehended.”

- 33.46 “Blessed Lord, why are physical forms, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, not apprehended? Why are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, not apprehended? Why are the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, not apprehended? Why are [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, being inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, not apprehended?”
- 33.47 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “with regard to physical forms, that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled cannot indeed be apprehended. Subhūti, with regard to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled cannot indeed be apprehended. With regard to the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled cannot indeed be apprehended. With regard to [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled cannot indeed be apprehended.” {Ki.IV:76}
- 33.48 “Blessed Lord, with regard to physical forms, why can that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled not be apprehended? With regard to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, why can that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled not be apprehended? [F.287.a] With regard to the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, why can that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled not be apprehended? With regard to [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, why can that which is inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled not be apprehended?”
- 33.49 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is because the essential nature of physical forms is inconceivable, inestimable, immeasurable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled that thoughts, estimates, measures, [appraisals], and parity are not apprehended with respect to physical forms. Subhūti, it is because the essential nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is inconceivable, inestimable, immeasurable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled that thoughts, estimates, measures, [appraisals], and parity are not apprehended with respect to consciousness [and so forth]. It is because the essential nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is inconceivable, inestimable, immeasurable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled that thoughts, estimates, measures, [appraisals], and parity are not apprehended with respect to the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. It is because the essential nature of [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is inconceivable, inestimable, immeasurable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled that thoughts, estimates, measures, [appraisals], and parity are not apprehended with respect to all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

33.50 “Subhūti, do you think that physical forms are apprehensible in physical forms that are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled? Are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness apprehensible in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled? [F.287.b] Are the links of dependent origination [and so forth] apprehensible in sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination that are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled? Is all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] apprehensible in [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

33.51 “So, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “it is for this reason that all phenomena are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, these attributes of the tathāgatas, which the tathāgatas possess, are inconceivable because they are free from concepts, inestimable because they are free from estimate, unappraisable because they are free from measure [or appraisal], and equal to the unequaled because they are free from parity. For this reason, Subhūti, all phenomena are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled.

33.52 “Subhūti, since these attributes of the tathāgatas, which the tathāgatas possess, completely transcend thought, they are inconceivable. Since they completely transcend estimate, they are inestimable. Since they completely transcend measure [or appraisal], they are unappraisable. Since they completely transcend parity, they are equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, that which is said to be inconceivable designates inconceivability. Subhūti, that which is said to be inestimable designates inestimability. Subhūti, that which is said to be unappraisable designates immeasurability. Subhūti, that which is said to be equal to the unequaled designates incomparability.

33.53 “Subhūti, [F.288.a] these attributes of the tathāgatas, which the tathāgatas possess, are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, they are said to be inconceivable because space is inconceivable, they are said to be inestimable because space is inestimable, they are said to be unappraisable because space is immeasurable, and they are said to be equal to the unequaled because space is equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, these attributes of the tathāgatas, which the tathāgatas possess, are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, {Ki.IV: 77} and equal to the unequaled. They cannot be conceived or estimated by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. So it is that the buddhas are unappraisable. The attributes of the buddhas are unappraisable.”

33.54 While the Blessed One was delivering this chapter concerning [the attributes of] the tathāgatas that are inconceivable, inestimable, unappraisable, and equal to the unequaled, the minds of five hundred monks were liberated from contaminants, without the grasping that is the immediate cause [of rebirth]. The minds of two hundred nuns were liberated from contaminants, without grasping. Sixty thousand laymen and thirty thousand laywomen developed the taintless, immaculate, and pure eye of the Dharma concerning phenomena. Twenty thousand bodhisattvas accepted that phenomena are nonarising, and the Blessed One prophesied that they would all become buddhas within this Auspicious Eon.

33.55 This completes the thirty-third chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 34

- 34.1 Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is profound. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for a great purpose. [F.288.b] It is established for an immeasurable purpose, an inestimable purpose, and an unappraisable purpose. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is established for a purpose that is equal to the unequaled.”
- 34.2 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom is established for a great purpose. This perfection of wisdom is established for an immeasurable purpose, an inestimable purpose, an unappraisable purpose, and a purpose that is equal to the unequaled. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the five other perfections are subsumed within this perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, the emptiness of internal phenomena is subsumed within this perfection of wisdom. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are subsumed within it. The four applications of mindfulness are subsumed within it, and the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are subsumed within it. Subhūti, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are subsumed within this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are subsumed within this perfection of wisdom. [F.289.a]

- 34.3 “Subhūti, just as when a king of the royal class who has been empowered through coronation and is secure in his dominion {Ki.IV:78} delegates all the royal functions and national duties to a minister, at that time he will have few concerns for those royal functions and national duties, and will have relinquished responsibility, in the same way, Subhūti, all the doctrines of the śrāvakas, and all the doctrines of the pratyekabuddhas, and all the doctrines of the bodhisattvas, and all the doctrines of the buddhas are subsumed within the perfection of wisdom. And it is the perfection of wisdom that implements them. So it is, Subhūti, that this perfection of wisdom is established for a great purpose. This perfection of wisdom is established for an inconceivable purpose. This perfection of wisdom is established for an inestimable purpose. This perfection of wisdom is established for an unappraisable purpose. This perfection of wisdom is established for a purpose that is equal to the unequaled. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because this profound perfection of wisdom is established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on physical forms. It is established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. It is established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on [all the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. It is established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on [all the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”
- 34.4 “Blessed Lord, how is this perfection of wisdom established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on physical forms? [F.289.b] How is it established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness? How is it established in order that one might not appropriate or become fixated on [all the attributes and goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”
- 34.5 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “do you observe any physical forms that one could appropriate or become fixated upon? Do you observe anything that one could appropriate or become fixated upon, or anything by which one could appropriate or become fixated?”
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 34.6 “Subhūti, do you observe any feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness that one could appropriate or become fixated upon? Do you observe anything that one could appropriate or become fixated upon, or anything by which one could appropriate or become fixated?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”

34.7 “Subhūti, do you observe any [attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that one could appropriate or become fixated upon? Do you observe anything that one could appropriate or become fixated upon, or anything by which one could appropriate or become fixated?” asked the Blessed One.

 “No, Blessed Lord!”

34.8 “Subhūti, do you observe any fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa that one could appropriate or become fixated upon? [F.290.a] Do you observe anything that one could appropriate or become fixated upon, or anything by which one could appropriate or become fixated?” asked the Blessed One.

 “No, Blessed Lord!”

34.9 “Subhūti, do you observe any [other fruit or goal, up to and including] unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, that one could appropriate or become fixated upon? Do you observe anything that one could appropriate or become fixated upon, or anything by which one could appropriate or become fixated?” asked the Blessed One.

 “No, Blessed Lord!”

34.10 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” continued the Blessed One. “Subhūti, I also do not observe physical forms. Since I do not observe them, I do not appropriate them. Since I do not appropriate them, I do not grasp them. Subhūti, I also do not observe feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. Since I do not observe them, I do not appropriate them. Since I do not appropriate them, I do not grasp them. Subhūti, I also do not observe [the attributes or goals], {Ki.IV: 79} up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Since I do not observe them, I do not appropriate them. Since I do not appropriate them, I do not grasp them. Subhūti, I also do not observe the buddha level, knowledge of all the dharmas, all-aspect omniscience, or the nature of the tathāgatas. Since I do not observe them, I do not appropriate them. Since I do not appropriate them, I do not grasp them.

34.11 “So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should not become fixated on physical forms [F.290.b] and should not appropriate them. They should not become fixated on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness and should not appropriate them. They should not become fixated on the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination and should not appropriate them. They should not become fixated on any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and should not appropriate them. They should not become fixated on [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and should not appropriate them. They should not become fixated on buddhahood, knowledge of all the dharmas, all-aspect omniscience, or the nature of the tathāgatas, and should not appropriate them.”

34.12 Then the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and those inhabiting the realm of form said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is profound, hard to discern, and hard to realize! It cannot be investigated and it is not within the range of sophistry. It is at peace and subtle. It can be known by the learned, the refined, and the clear-minded. Blessed Lord, those beings who are inclined toward this profound perfection of wisdom [F.291.a] have fulfilled their duties in the presence of the conquerors of the past. Blessed Lord, those beings who are inclined toward this profound perfection of wisdom have been accepted by spiritual mentors, and they have planted the roots of virtuous actions.

34.13 “Blessed Lord, comparing the entire cognition and exertion of all those beings in the world systems of the great trichilocosm, as many as there are, who have become followers through faith, who have become followers of the Dharma, who have reached the eighth level, who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, who have attained arhatship, and who have become pratyekabuddhas, {Ki.IV: 80} with that of anyone who is inclined toward this profound perfection of wisdom for the duration of a single day, thinking of it, appraising it, examining it, or investigating it, this inclination [of the latter] toward the profound perfection of wisdom for the duration of a single day will be superior. If you ask why, it is because the full extent of the cognition and the full extent of the exertion of those who have become followers through faith, and those who have become followers of the Dharma, who have reached the eighth level, who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, who have attained arhatship, and who have become pratyekabuddhas, is subsumed in the receptivity of bodhisattva great beings who have accepted that phenomena are nonarising.”

34.14 Then the Blessed One addressed those gods inhabiting the realm of desire and those gods inhabiting the realm of form as follows: “O gods! It is so! It is so! The full extent of the cognition and the full extent of the exertion of those who have become followers through faith, and those who have become followers of the Dharma, who have reached the eighth level, who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, who have attained arhatship, and who have become pratyekabuddhas, is subsumed in the receptivity of bodhisattva great beings who have accepted that phenomena are nonarising. O gods, one should know that any noble sons or noble daughters who have heard this profound perfection of wisdom, [F.291.b] and who, having heard it, aspire toward it, and who, having aspired toward it, commit it to writing, and having committed it to writing, transmit and disseminate it, focusing their attention correctly on it, will swiftly be emancipated, and not those noble sons or noble daughters who are followers of the vehicles of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and who practice according to other sūtras, apart from the perfection of wisdom, for an eon or longer than an eon. If you ask why, it is because those who have become followers through faith, and those who have become followers of the Dharma, who have reached the eighth level, who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, who have attained arhatship, and who have become pratyekabuddhas should train in the attributes that are to be perfected through this profound perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings should train in them—it is extensively revealed that, having trained in them, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, will attain consummate buddhahood, and are attaining consummate buddhahood.”

- 34.15 Then the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and those inhabiting the realm of form pronounced the following meaningful proclamation: “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the great perfection. Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is the inestimable perfection. This is the unappraisable perfection. This is the perfection that is equal to the unequaled. Blessed Lord, it is having trained in this profound perfection of wisdom that those who have become followers through faith have been emancipated, are emancipated, and will be emancipated, and that those who have become followers of the Dharma, who have reached the eighth level, who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, and [F.292.a] who have attained arhatship have been emancipated, are emancipated, and will be emancipated. It is having trained in it that pratyekabuddhas have been emancipated, are emancipated, and will be emancipated. {Ki.IV: 81} It is having trained in it that bodhisattva great beings have attained, are attaining, and will attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. This profound perfection of wisdom is neither diminished nor replenished.”

34.16 Then the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and those inhabiting the realm of form prostrated with their heads toward the feet of the Blessed One, and circumambulated the Blessed One three times from the right, before departing from his presence. Having gone not very far, they disappeared, the gods inhabiting the realm of desire proceeding to the realm of desire, and the gods inhabiting the realm of form proceeding to the realm of form.

34.17 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings who have heard this perfection of wisdom, immediately afterward are inclined toward it, and, as mentioned before, commit it to writing, take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, from where will they pass away and be reborn into this [human world]?”

34.18 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who, having heard this profound perfection of wisdom, immediately afterward are inclined toward it, are not discouraged, not thoroughly discouraged, not deluded, and have neither hesitation nor doubt, who delight in hearing this profound perfection of wisdom and after hearing this profound perfection of wisdom direct their mind on it, without letting go of their attention, will always follow without interruption those individuals who are not afraid to guard it and who speak of it, [F.292.b] whether they are going, coming, standing up, sitting down, or reclining.

34.19 “Subhūti, just as a milch cow does not abandon her newborn calf, if bodhisattva great beings, for the sake of this profound perfection of wisdom, do not forsake [the teachers] who preach this Dharma until they have brought into being this perfection of wisdom, and have become familiar with it through mindfulness, investigated it with their minds, and comprehended it through the view, then, Subhūti, those individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will pass away among humankind and be reborn among humankind. If you ask why, it is because those noble children who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, after hearing, taking up, upholding, reciting, mastering, and focusing their attention correctly on this perfection of wisdom in their former lives—and having, in the aforementioned manner, committed it to writing, compiled it as a book, and then served, respected, honored, and worshiped it with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and many ribbons—will, through these roots of virtuous action, pass away among humankind and be reborn among humankind. One will see that immediately after they have heard of this profound perfection of wisdom they will be inclined toward it.”

{Ki.IV: 82}

34.20 “Blessed Lord, could bodhisattva great beings who are inclined toward this profound perfection of wisdom immediately after hearing it, and who have acquired these enlightened attributes by committing it to writing, and having committed it to writing also transmitted and disseminated it, focusing their attention correctly on it, have venerated other lord buddhas, and then passed away and been reborn in this [human world]?”

34.21 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva [F.293.a] great beings who have venerated other lord buddhas, and then passed away to be reborn in this [human world], will be inclined toward this profound perfection of wisdom immediately after hearing it, and having been inclined toward it, will commit it to writing, and having committed it to writing, will transmit and disseminate it, focusing their attention correctly on it. If you ask why, it is because those bodhisattva great beings have heard this profound perfection of wisdom from those lord buddhas, and, after hearing it, they have taken up, upheld, recited, mastered, disseminated, and focused their attention correctly on it. Through these roots of virtuous action and through focusing their attention on it, they have been reborn in this [human world].

34.22 “Moreover, Subhūti, if there are bodhisattva great beings who have [previously] been born equal in fortune to the gods of Tuṣita, and who, on passing away from that [divine realm], have been reborn with fortune equal to that of humankind, one should know that they are also endowed with those same enlightened attributes. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because those bodhisattva great beings who have been born in the abode of Tuṣita have investigated this profound perfection of wisdom and questioned the bodhisattva great being Maitreya about it. So, one should know that it is through these roots of virtuous action that they have been reborn in this [human world].

34.23 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard the perfection of wisdom in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate it. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented.

34.24 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, [F.293.b] and the perfection of generosity in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented. {Ki.IV:83}

34.25 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard of the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, and the emptiness of external and internal phenomena in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented.

34.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented.

34.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard of the four applications of mindfulness in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented.

34.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard of the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds [F.294.a] are discouraged and disoriented.

34.29 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard of the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented.

34.30 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard of [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate them. When this profound perfection of wisdom is now revealed, they harbor doubts, they are deluded, and their minds are discouraged and disoriented. {Ki.IV: 84}

34.31 “Moreover, Subhūti, if there are individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who, despite having heard this profound perfection of wisdom in former lives, have not had an opportunity to pose questions and investigate it, and have not pursued it for one, two, three, four, or five days, when those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas now investigate and pose questions about this profound perfection of wisdom, and pursue it for one, two, [F.294.b] three, four, or five days, they will not be captivated by this profound perfection of wisdom, and indeed will not pose questions about it. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because those individuals who have not investigated, posed questions about, and pursued this profound perfection of wisdom will turn out like that. They will have listened to this profound perfection of wisdom, but will have only developed their positive attitude and devotion to that extent. They will sometimes have devotion to it and at other times they will not have devotion to it. They will be swayed by their mood swings, like a fragment of tree cotton.

34.32 “Subhūti, you should know that those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have not been engaged in this vehicle for a long period of time. They have not been accepted by a spiritual mentor, and they have not venerated the completely awakened buddhas.

34.33 “Subhūti, those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have not transmitted or disseminated this profound perfection of wisdom, and they have not focused their attention correctly on it. They have not trained in the perfection of wisdom, nor have they trained in the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity. They have not trained in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they have not trained in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They have not trained in the applications of mindfulness, and they have not trained in the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment and the noble eightfold path. They have not trained in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, [F.295.a] the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They have not trained in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. [B47]

34.34 “Subhūti, you should know that those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have newly embarked on the vehicle. They are merely endowed with a little faith, a little love, and a little devotion. They will not be able to commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, {Ki.IV: 85} or to recite, transmit, and disseminate it, focusing their attention correctly on it. Subhūti, if noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas do not commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, do not transmit it, do not disseminate it, and do not focus their attention correctly on it, and if they do not benefit others through this profound perfection of wisdom; if they do not benefit others through the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; if they do not benefit others through the emptiness of internal phenomena; if they do not benefit others through [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; if they do not benefit others through the applications of mindfulness; if they do not benefit others through [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path; if they do not benefit others through [the fruitional attributes and goals], [F.295.b] up to and including all-aspect omniscience; if they do not practice in accordance with perfection of wisdom; if they do not practice in accordance with the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; if they do not practice in accordance with the emptiness of internal phenomena; if they do not practice in accordance with [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; if they do not practice in accordance with the applications of mindfulness; if they do not practice in accordance with [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path; and if they do not practice in accordance with [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then they will be restricted to one of [only] two places—that is, two levels the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, it is because those noble sons or noble daughters in the past have not committed this profound perfection of wisdom to writing, they have not revealed it, they have not disseminated it, and they have not focused their attention correctly on it. They have not even benefited others through this perfection of wisdom and they have not practiced in accordance with this perfection of wisdom. For this reason, you should know that those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will be restricted to [only] one of those two places and two levels.”

34.35 This completes the thirty-fourth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 35

35.1 “Subhūti, you should know that this is like when a ship is wrecked at sea. If the people on board do not catch and hold on to a piece of wood, a wooden log, a wooden plank, a leather bag, or a human corpse, they will surely die, Subhūti, without reaching the ocean shore. Subhūti, when a ship is wrecked at sea, the people on board who do catch and hold on to a piece of wood, a wooden log, a wooden plank, [F.296.a] a leather bag, or a human corpse will not die at sea. They will safely reach the other shore of the ocean, uninjured and unharmed. They will reach dry land, uninjured and unharmed.

35.2 “In the same way, Subhūti, those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and who have just a little faith, a little love, and a little devotion for this profound perfection of wisdom do not commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing. They do not teach it, do not disseminate it, do not focus their attention correctly on it, and do not rely upon it. They do not commit to writing the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity. They do not reveal them, do not disseminate them, do not focus their attention correctly on them, and do not rely upon them. They do not commit to writing the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, {Ki.IV: 86} the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, or the [goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They do not reveal them, do not disseminate them, do not focus their attention correctly on them, and do not rely upon them. In the interim, they will lapse from enlightenment. Without attaining all-aspect omniscience, [F.296.b] they will actualize the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

35.3 “Subhūti, those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment do commit this profound perfection of wisdom to writing. They transmit and disseminate it, focusing their attention correctly on it, and they rely upon it. So it is that those noble sons or noble daughters have faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. For this reason they are sustained by the perfection of wisdom, and they are sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. They are sustained by the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. [F.297.a] They are sustained by the [goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. So, in the interim they will not be damaged. They will transcend the level of the śrāvakas. They will transcend the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Having brought beings to maturity and having refined the buddhafiels, they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 87}

35.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, you should know that this is like when a man or woman thinks of fetching water in an unbaked clay jar that has not been fired—that jar would not last long, but would swiftly break up and disintegrate. If you ask why, it is because the jar is unbaked. In the end it will turn to mud. In the same way, Subhūti, if those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but nonetheless are not sustained by the perfection of wisdom; are not sustained by skillful means; are not sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; and if they are not sustained by the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; and if they are not sustained by the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the path; and if they are not sustained by the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, [F.297.b] the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if they are not sustained by [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then you should know that those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will be damaged in interim states. Subhūti, if you ask what are the interim states in which those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will be damaged, they comprise the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

- 35.5 “Subhūti, it is just as when a man or a woman fetches water from a river, lake, pool, or well with a clay jar that has been well baked—you should know, Subhūti, that the jar of this water carrier will easily be brought home. In the same way, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings who are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment have been sustained by the perfection of wisdom; if they have been sustained by skillful means; if they have been sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, {Ki.IV: 88} and the perfection of generosity; [F.298.a] and if they have been sustained by [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will not be damaged in interim states—the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Uninjured and unharmed, they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

35.6 “Subhūti, it is just as if an ocean-going ship that has not been repaired and caulked were to set out to sea, loaded with merchandise—one should know, Subhūti, that this ship will disintegrate. The ship will go one way and the cargo another, so that the merchant, being unskilled in means, will incur great misfortune and suffer the loss of great prosperity. In the same way, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but, nonetheless, are not sustained by the perfection of wisdom; are not sustained by skill in means; are not sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity; are not sustained by any of the aspects of emptiness; are not sustained by the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; are not sustained by the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness— [F.298.b] the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if they are not sustained by [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then you should know, Subhūti, that those bodhisattva great beings will be damaged in the interim states. They will be deprived of the great advantage that is the wealth of all-aspect omniscience, and they will suffer the loss of great prosperity. Subhūti, if you ask what are the interim states in which those bodhisattva great beings are damaged, they comprise the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

35.7 “Subhūti, it is just as if a skilled person were to launch into the water an ocean-going ship that has been properly caulked and properly prepared, and load it with merchandise—you should know, Subhūti, that this ocean-going ship would not disintegrate midway, and it would reach its destination. In the same way, Subhūti, if any bodhisattva great beings are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, {Ki.IV: 89} higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and if in addition they have also been sustained by the perfection of wisdom; if they have been sustained by skill in means; if they have been sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; if they have been sustained by the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, [F.299.a] the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if they have been sustained by [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then you should know, Subhūti, that those bodhisattva great beings intent on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment will not be damaged in the interim states.

35.8 “Subhūti, they will indeed turn out like that. If any bodhisattva great beings who are indeed endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and if in addition they have been sustained by the perfection of wisdom, if they have been sustained by skill in means, if they have been sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline and the perfection of generosity, and if they have been sustained by [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, those bodhisattva great beings will not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

35.9 “Subhūti, if, as an analogy, the body of an aged and decrepit old man who has reached the age of one hundred and twenty were to succumb to some illness, due to a wind, bile, or [F.299.b] phlegm disorder, or to a combination of these, do you think, Subhūti, that this man would be able to rise from his bed unaided?”

35.10 “No, Blessed Lord! Even if he were capable of rising from the bed, he would not be able to walk for more than one or two krośa.⁴⁴⁸ Because that man would be ravaged by old age and suffering, he would not be able to walk far, even if he could rise from his bed.” {Ki.IV:90}

35.11 “In the same way, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if bodhisattva great beings who are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but nonetheless have not been sustained by the perfection of wisdom; have not been sustained by skill in means; have not been sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity; have not been sustained by the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, or [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; have not been sustained by the applications of mindfulness; have not been sustained by the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the path; have not been sustained by the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, [F.300.a] the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and have not been sustained by [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, in that case, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will fall into the interim states—the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, it is because they have not been sustained by the perfection of wisdom, they have not been sustained by skillful means, and they have not been sustained by [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

- 35.12 “Subhūti, just as when that same aged and decrepit old man, who has reached the age of one hundred and twenty and whose body had succumbed to some illness, due to a wind, bile, or phlegm disorder, or to a combination of these, wishes to rise from his bed, and two strong men then hold and support him on his left and right sides, and urge him on, saying, ‘Sir, you may freely go wherever you wish. You should not be afraid because we will hold and support you on the way, as far as your destination,’ in the same way, Subhūti, if any bodhisattva great beings are endowed with faith, tolerance, devotion, higher aspiration, love, enthusiasm, relentlessness, and unrelenting perseverance for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and if in addition they are also sustained by the perfection of wisdom; if they are sustained by skill in means; if they are sustained by the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, [F.300.b] the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity; if they are sustained by the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; if they are sustained by the applications of mindfulness; if they are sustained by the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the path; if they are sustained by the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if they are sustained by [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, then, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will not be damaged in the interim states. Those bodhisattva great beings can reach the abode of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they are not separated from the perfection of wisdom, and they are not separated from skillful means.”

35.13 “Blessed Lord, how do individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas because they are not separated from the perfection of wisdom or from skillful means?” {Ki.IV:91}

35.14 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is excellent that you think to question the Tathāgata about this matter for the sake of individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. [F.301.a] Excellent! In this regard, Subhūti, at the beginning, when individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas dispense gifts, they do so with a mind that succumbs to [notions of] ‘me’ and ‘mine.’ When they maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivate wisdom, they do so with a mind that succumbs to [notions of] ‘me’ and ‘mine.’ When they dispense gifts, they think, ‘I am giving gifts! I am giving gifts to them! I am a giver!’ and similarly, ‘I am maintaining ethical discipline! I maintain this ethical discipline! I am ethical! I am cultivating tolerance! This is the tolerance I cultivate! I am tolerant! I am undertaking perseverance! This is the perseverance I undertake! I am one who perseveres! I am absorbed in meditative concentration! These are the meditative concentrations in which I am absorbed! I am a meditator! I am cultivating wisdom! This is the wisdom I cultivate! I am wise!’ They give rise to conceits about gifts, they give rise to conceits on account of gifts, and they give rise to the conceit that they are givers.⁴⁴⁹ They give rise to conceits about ethical discipline, they give rise to conceits on account of ethical discipline, and they give rise to the conceit that they are ethical. They give rise to conceits about tolerance, they give rise to conceits on account of tolerance, and they give rise to the conceit that they are tolerant. They give rise to conceits about perseverance, they give rise to conceits on account of perseverance, and they give rise to the conceit that they are persevering. They give rise to conceits about the meditative concentrations, they give rise to conceits on account of the meditative concentrations, [F.301.b] and they give rise to the conceit that they are meditators. They give rise to conceits about wisdom, they give rise to conceits on account of wisdom, and they give rise to the conceit that they are wise. If you were to ask, 'How is that?' in the perfection of generosity there are no such concepts. The perfection of generosity is far removed. In the perfection of ethical discipline there are no such concepts. The perfection of ethical discipline is far removed. In the perfection of tolerance there are no such concepts. The perfection of tolerance is far removed. In the perfection of perseverance there are no such concepts. The perfection of perseverance is far removed. In the perfection of meditative concentration there are no such concepts. The perfection of meditative concentration is far removed. In the perfection of wisdom there are no such concepts. The perfection of wisdom is far removed.

35.15 "Indeed, it is the case that those [just-mentioned] individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas do not understand that which is far removed, and do not understand that which is transcendent. They have not been sustained by the perfection of generosity, and they have not been sustained by the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They have not been sustained by [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, for which reason they fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and are not emancipated in all-aspect omniscience.

35.16 "Subhūti, if you ask how individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas are lacking in skillful means, in this regard, Subhūti, at the beginning individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas dispense gifts without skillful means, they maintain ethical discipline without skillful means, they cultivate tolerance without skillful means, they undertake perseverance without skillful means, they are absorbed in meditative concentration without skillful means, [F.302.a] and they cultivate wisdom without skillful means. And they think, 'I am giving gifts! This is the gift I am giving! I am giving a gift to them! I am a giver! I am maintaining ethical discipline! This is the ethical discipline I maintain! I am cultivating tolerance! This is the tolerance I cultivate! {Ki.IV: 92} I am undertaking perseverance! This is the perseverance I undertake! I am absorbed in the meditative concentrations! These are the meditative concentrations in which I am absorbed! I am cultivating wisdom! This is the wisdom I cultivate!' They give rise to conceits about gifts, they give rise to conceits on account of gifts, and they give rise to the conceit that they are givers. They give rise to conceits about ethical discipline, they give rise to conceits on account of ethical discipline, and they give rise to the conceit that they are ethical. They give rise to conceits about tolerance, they give rise to conceits on account of tolerance, and they give rise to the conceit that they are tolerant. They give rise to conceits about perseverance, they give rise to conceits on account of perseverance, and they give rise to the conceit that they are persevering. They give rise to conceits about the meditative concentrations, they give rise to conceits on account of the meditative concentrations, and they give rise to the conceit that they are meditators. They give rise to conceits about wisdom, they give rise to conceits on account of wisdom, and they give rise to the conceit that they are wise. If you ask why, in the perfection of generosity there are no such concepts. If you ask why, it is because the perfection of generosity is not a perfection. The perfection of ethical discipline is not a perfection. The perfection of tolerance is not a perfection. The perfection of perseverance is not a perfection. The perfection of meditative concentration is not a perfection. [F.302.b] The perfection of wisdom is not a perfection.

35.17 "It is indeed the case that those [aforementioned individuals] who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas do not understand that which is far removed, and do not understand that which is transcendent. They have not been sustained by the perfection of generosity, and they have not been sustained by the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They have not been sustained by skillful means, and they have not been sustained by [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, for which reason they fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and are not emancipated in all-aspect omniscience.

35.18 "Subhūti, if you ask how individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who have been sustained by the perfection of wisdom and by skillful means do not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in this regard, Subhūti, when individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas from the very beginning dispense gifts, they do so with a mind that does not succumb to [notions of] 'me' and 'mine.' When they maintain ethical discipline, they do so with a mind that does not succumb to [notions of] 'me' and 'mine.' When they cultivate tolerance, they do so with a mind that does not succumb to [notions of] 'me' and 'mine.' When they undertake perseverance, they do so with a mind that does not succumb to [notions of]

‘me’ and ‘mine.’ When they cultivate meditative concentration, they do so with a mind that does not succumb to [notions of] ‘me’ and ‘mine.’ When they cultivate wisdom, they do so with a mind that does not succumb to [notions of] ‘me’ and ‘mine.’ They do not think, ‘I am giving gifts! I am giving gifts to them!’ They do not think, ‘I am maintaining ethical discipline! This is the ethical discipline I maintain! [F.303.a] I am cultivating tolerance! This is the tolerance I cultivate! {Ki.IV: 93} I am undertaking perseverance! This is the perseverance I undertake! I am absorbed in the meditative concentrations! These are the meditative concentrations in which I am absorbed! I am cultivating wisdom! This is the wisdom I am cultivating!’ They do not give rise to conceits about gifts, they do not give rise to conceits on account of gifts, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are givers. They do not give rise to conceits about ethical discipline, they do not give rise to conceits on account of ethical discipline, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are ethical. They do not give rise to conceits about tolerance, they do not give rise to conceits on account of tolerance, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are tolerant. They do not give rise to conceits about perseverance, they do not give rise to conceits on account of perseverance, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are persevering. They do not give rise to conceits about the meditative concentrations, they do not give rise to conceits on account of the meditative concentrations, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are meditators. They do not give rise to conceits about wisdom, they do not give rise to conceits on account of wisdom, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are wise. If you were to ask, ‘How is that?’ in the perfection of generosity there are no concepts through which they could give rise to conceits. This is because the perfection of generosity is not a perfection. In the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom there are no concepts through which they could give rise to conceits. This is because the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] are not perfections. [F.303.b] In this case, the individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas do indeed understand that which is far removed and that which is transcendent. They also do not give rise to conceits and they are sustained by the perfection of generosity. They are sustained by the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and they are sustained by [the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, for which reason they do not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and they will also attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

35.19 “So it is, Subhūti, that individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas are sustained by the perfection of wisdom, they are sustained by skillful means, and they are sustained by [the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They do not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

35.20 “Subhūti, if you ask how individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas are sustained by skillful means, in this regard, Subhūti, individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas from the very beginning dispense gifts with skillful means. They maintain ethical discipline with skillful means, they cultivate tolerance with skillful means, they undertake perseverance with skillful means, they are absorbed in the meditative concentrations with skillful means, and they cultivate wisdom with skillful means. For they do not think, ‘I am giving gifts! This is the gift I am giving! I am giving gifts to them!’ They do not think, ‘I am maintaining ethical discipline! This is the ethical discipline I maintain!’ They do not think, ‘I am cultivating tolerance! This is the tolerance I cultivate!’ They do not think, ‘I am undertaking perseverance! This is the perseverance I undertake!’ They do not think, ‘I am absorbed in the meditative concentrations! These are the meditative concentrations in which I am absorbed!’ [F.304.a] They do not think, ‘I am cultivating wisdom! This is the wisdom I cultivate!’ They do not give rise to conceits about gifts, they do not give rise to conceits on account of gifts, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are givers. They do not give rise to conceits about ethical discipline, they do not give rise to conceits on account of ethical discipline, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are ethical. They do not give rise to conceits about tolerance, they do not give rise to conceits on account of tolerance, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are tolerant. They do not give rise to conceits about perseverance, they do not give rise to conceits on account of perseverance, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are persevering. They do not give rise to conceits about the meditative concentrations, they do not give rise to conceits on account of the meditative concentrations, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are meditators. They do not give rise to conceits about wisdom, they do not give rise to conceits on account of wisdom, and they do not give rise to the conceit that they are wise. If you ask why, it is because they with are without concepts, and in the perfection of generosity there are no concepts. If you ask why, it is because the perfection of generosity is not a perfection. They with are without concepts, and in the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom there are no concepts. If you ask why, it is because the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] are not perfections. In this case, the individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas do indeed understand that which is far removed and they understand that which is transcendent, and yet they do not give rise to conceits. They are sustained by the perfection of generosity. They are sustained by the perfection of ethical discipline, [F.304.b] the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They are sustained by skillful means, and they are sustained by [the other attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, for which reason they do not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and they will also be emancipated in all-aspect omniscience.”

35.21 This completes the thirty-fifth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 36

- 36.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how should those bodhisattva great beings who are beginners train in the perfection of wisdom? How should they train in the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity?”
- 36.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who are beginners and wish to train in the perfection of wisdom, and who wish to train in the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, {Ki.IV: 94} the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity, should rely upon and venerate spiritual mentors who can confer instruction in the perfection of wisdom, and who can confer instruction in the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. These [spiritual mentors] will grant them instruction in the perfection of wisdom, saying, ‘Come here, noble child! You should dedicate all the gifts you have offered to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Come here, noble child! You should dedicate all the ethical discipline that you have maintained, [F.305.a] all the tolerance that you have acquired, all the perseverance that you have undertaken, all the meditative concentration in which you have been absorbed, and all the wisdom that you have cultivated to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Noble child, you should not misconstrue unsurpassed, complete enlightenment as physical forms, and you should not misconstrue it as feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness! You should not misconstrue it as the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination! Noble child, you should not misconstrue unsurpassed, complete enlightenment as the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom! Noble child, you should not misconstrue unsurpassed, complete enlightenment as the emptiness of internal phenomena, and you should not misconstrue it as the [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Noble child, you should not misconstrue unsurpassed, complete enlightenment as the applications of mindfulness, and you should not misconstrue it as the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, [F.305.b] the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. You should not misconstrue unsurpassed, complete enlightenment as [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

- 36.3 “ ‘If you ask why, when physical forms are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the perfection of generosity is not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the emptiness of internal phenomena is not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the applications of mindfulness are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the paths are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When the truths of the noble ones, {Ki.IV: 95} [F.306.a] the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained. When [the goals], up to and including knowledge of the path, are not misconstrued, all-aspect omniscience will be attained.

36.4 “ ‘Noble child, do not generate desire for physical forms! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because physical forms are undesirable. Do not generate desire for feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because consciousness [and so forth] are undesirable. Do not generate desire for the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are undesirable. Noble child, do not generate desire for the perfection of generosity! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because the perfection of generosity is undesirable. Do not generate desire for the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] are undesirable. Do not generate desire for the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, [F.306.b] the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, or [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth] are undesirable. Do not generate desire for the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the path! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because the noble eightfold path [and so forth] are undesirable. Do not generate desire for the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, or [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are undesirable.

36.5 “ ‘Noble child, do not generate desire for the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa! Do not generate desire for the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment! Do not generate desire for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! If you ask why, O noble child, it is because enlightenment is undesirable. If you ask why that is the case, O noble child, it is because all phenomena are empty of essential nature.’ ”

36.6 Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, [F.307.a] those bodhisattva great beings who aspire to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are engaged in a difficult task, inasmuch as all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics.”

36.7 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who aspire to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are engaged in a difficult task, inasmuch as all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics. Even so, Subhūti, having understood that all phenomena are like a magical display and dreamlike, bodhisattva great beings embark on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That is to say, bodhisattva great beings embark on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment {Ki.IV: 96} for the benefit, well-being, and happiness of the world. So, they set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become a protector for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become a refuge for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become a sanctuary for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become an ally for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become an island for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become a lamp for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become a torchbearer, a beacon of light, [F.307.b] a helmsman, and a guide for the world!’ They set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, ‘Let us become a pathway for the world!’

36.8 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the benefit of the world, in this regard, Subhūti, all the gifts that bodhisattva great beings give are for the release of all beings from suffering. All the ethical discipline that they maintain, all the tolerance that they cultivate, all the perseverance that they undertake, all the meditative concentrations in which they are absorbed, and all the wisdom that they cultivate is for the release of all beings from suffering. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and set out for the benefit of the world.

- 36.9 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings set out for the well-being of the world, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings release beings from the five destinies of cyclic existence and establish them in nirvāṇa, the secure ground that is without fear. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and set out for the well-being of the world.
- 36.10 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings set out for the happiness of the world, [F.308.a] in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment release beings from suffering, discomfort, and disturbance, and establish them in nirvāṇa, the secure ground that is without fear. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and set out for the happiness of the world.
- 36.11 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment act as a protector of the world, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment shelter beings from all modes of suffering in cyclic existence, and teach them the Dharma so that they may abandon those sufferings. Having heard the Dharma, these beings will also gradually turn toward final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment act as a protector of the world. [B48]
- 36.12 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment become a refuge for the world, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva [F.308.b] great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment release beings with the affliction of birth, beings with the affliction of aging, beings with the affliction of sickness, beings with the affliction of death, beings with the affliction of sorrow, and beings with the affliction of lamentation, suffering, discomfort, and disturbance from those [states of] birth, aging, sickness, death sorrow, lamentation, suffering, discomfort, and disturbance, and bring them to pass into final nirvāṇa, in the expanse of nirvāṇa where the aggregates are not left behind. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment act as a refuge for the world. {Ki.IV: 97}

- 36.13 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment become a sanctuary for the world, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment teach the Dharma without embracing anything. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment become a sanctuary for the world.”
- 36.14 “Blessed Lord, in what manner do they not embrace anything?”
 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the nonembracing of physical forms is the nonassociation of physical forms. The nonassociation of physical forms [F.309.a] is the nonarising of physical forms. The nonarising of physical forms is the nonceasing of physical forms. The nonceasing of physical forms is the nonembracing of physical forms.
- 36.15 “The nonembracing of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is the nonassociation of consciousness [and so forth]. The nonassociation of consciousness [and so forth] is the nonarising of consciousness [and so forth]. The nonarising of consciousness [and so forth] is the nonceasing of consciousness [and so forth]. The nonceasing of consciousness [and so forth] is the nonembracing of consciousness [and so forth].
- 36.16 “The nonembracing of the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is the nonassociation of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. The nonassociation of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is the nonarising of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. The nonarising of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is the nonceasing of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. [F.309.b] The nonceasing of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is the nonembracing of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment teach the Dharma without embracing anything.

36.17 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment become an ally of the world, in this regard, Subhūti, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they teach the Dharma to beings as follows: The transcendence of physical forms is not physical forms. The transcendence of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is not consciousness [and so forth]. The transcendence of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination is not the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The transcendence of all the perfections is not the perfections. The transcendence of all the aspects of emptiness is not the aspects of emptiness. The transcendence of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment is not the factors conducive to enlightenment. The transcendence of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, {Ki.IV: 98} the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, [F.310.a] great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is not the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. The transcendence of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is not all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. Subhūti, just as this applies to physical forms, so indeed it applies to all phenomena.”

36.18 “Blessed Lord, if, as you have said, it is the case that this applies to all phenomena just as it applies to physical forms, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings would attain consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, in the transcendence of physical forms there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of feelings, the transcendence of perceptions, the transcendence of formative predispositions, and the transcendence of consciousness there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, there is no conceptual notion at all. [F.310.b] That is to say, there is no conceptual notion at all such as, ‘These are physical forms. These are feelings. These are perceptions. These are formative predispositions. This is consciousness. These are the sense fields. These are the sensory elements. These are the links of dependent origination. These are all the perfections. These are all the aspects of emptiness. These are the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. These are the truths of the noble ones. These are the meditative concentrations. These are the immeasurable attitudes. These are the formless absorptions. These are the eight aspects of liberation. These are the nine serial steps of meditative absorption. These are the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. These are the extrasensory powers. These are the meditative stabilities. These are the dhāraṇī gateways. These are the ten powers of the tathāgatas. These are the four fearlessnesses. These are the four kinds of exact knowledge. This is great loving kindness. This is great compassion. These are the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. These are [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’ ”

36.19 “It is so, Subhūti! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “In the transcendence of physical forms there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of feelings, the transcendence of perceptions, the transcendence of formative predispositions, and the transcendence of consciousness there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination there is no conceptual notion at all. In the transcendence of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.311.a] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, there is no conceptual notion at all. That is to say, there is no conceptual notion at all such as, ‘These are physical forms. These are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. These are the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. These are all the perfections. These are all the aspects of emptiness. These are the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. These are the truths of the noble ones. These are the meditative concentrations. These are the immeasurable attitudes. These are the formless absorptions. These are the eight aspects of liberation. These are the nine serial steps of meditative absorption. These are the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. These are the extrasensory powers. These are the meditative stabilities. These are the dhāraṇī gateways. These are the ten powers of the tathāgatas. These are the four fearlessnesses. These are the four kinds of exact knowledge. This is great loving kindness. This is great compassion. These are the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. These are [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’

36.20 “Subhūti, [F.311.b] although they observe that those phenomena are at peace in that way, bodhisattva great beings take on the difficult thought, without being discouraged, ‘I will attain consummate buddhahood in accord with these phenomena! Then, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment in that manner, I will explain how these phenomena are peaceful and excellent!’ It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, act as an ally of the world. {Ki.IV: 99}

36.21 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, become an island for the world, just as, Subhūti, islands consist of land that is totally confined by water, whether by rivers, streams, or oceans, in the same way, Subhūti, physical forms are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The perfection of generosity is confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, and the emptiness of external and internal phenomena are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, [F.312.a] are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are confined by the limit of past time and the limit of future time.

36.22 “Subhūti, all phenomena are confined by these delimiting phenomena, comprising the limit of past time and the limit of future time. Subhūti, that which confines all phenomena by the limit of past time and the limit of future time is peaceful; it is excellent and it is authentic. That is to say, it is [also known as] emptiness, nonapprehension, the termination of the path, the exhaustion of craving, the nonembracing [of phenomena], freedom from desire, cessation, and nirvāṇa. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, reveal these phenomena that are peaceful and excellent. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, become an island for beings. [F.312.b]

36.23 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings become a lamp for the world after having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in this regard, Subhūti, for a long time they act as a lamp through their wisdom for the sake of beings who are trapped in the obscurity of the eggshell of ignorance and overwhelmed by darkness. They dispel the darkness of delusion, the gloom of ignorance, and the obscurity of unknowing. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, become a lamp for the world.

36.24 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings become a torchbearer and a beacon of light for beings after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in this regard, Subhūti, {Ki.IV: 100} bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, reveal to beings without error the meaning of the sūtras endowed with the six perfections, endowed with the four modes of blessing,⁴⁵⁰ and endowed with the four attractive qualities. They also encourage beings toward them, and they secure and establish them there. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, act as a torchbearer and beacon of light for beings.

36.25 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings become a helmsman for beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.313.a] in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, reveal the sole reliable path to beings who have gone astray on mistaken paths and are attached to the four modes of improper perspective,⁴⁵¹ in order that beings might achieve purification, because it genuinely transcends sorrow and affliction, causes suffering and discomfort to subside, induces understanding of the Dharma that is endowed with awareness, and causes nirvāṇa to be actualized. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, become a helmsman for beings.

36.26 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings become a guide for beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, reveal the Dharma to the effect that physical forms neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the perfection of generosity neither arises nor ceases, and is neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the perfection of ethical discipline, [F.313.b] the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the emptiness of internal phenomena neither arises nor ceases, and is neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the applications of mindfulness neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, {Ki.IV: 101} the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa neither arises nor ceases, and is neither afflicted nor purified. [F.314.a] They reveal the Dharma to the effect that the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and [the other goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, neither arise nor cease, and are neither afflicted nor purified. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, become a guide for beings.

36.27 “If you ask, Subhūti, how bodhisattva great beings become a pathway for beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, reveal to beings the Dharma that physical forms are of the nature of space. They reveal to beings the Dharma that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are of the nature of space. They reveal to beings the Dharma that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are of the nature of space. They reveal to beings the Dharma that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, [F.314.b] the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are of the nature of space. They reveal to beings the Dharma that [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are of the nature of space.

36.28 “They reveal to beings the Dharma that the emptiness of physical forms is without movement, that is to say, it neither goes nor comes. They reveal to beings the Dharma that the emptiness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is without movement, that is to say, it neither goes nor comes. They reveal to beings the Dharma that the emptiness of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is without movement, that is to say, it neither goes nor comes.

They reveal to beings the Dharma that the emptiness of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is without movement, that is to say, it neither goes nor comes. [F.315.a] They reveal to beings the Dharma that the emptiness of [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is without movement, that is to say, it neither goes nor comes. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, become a pathway for beings.

36.29 “If you ask why, all phenomena are of the nature of emptiness. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in emptiness going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of signlessness. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in signlessness going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of wishlessness. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in wishlessness going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of nonconditioning. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in nonconditioning going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of nonarising and nonceasing. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in nonarising and nonceasing, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of nonaffliction and nonpurification. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in nonaffliction and nonpurification, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of dreams. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in dreams going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of magical displays. [F.315.b] They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in magical displays going and coming are not apprehended. {Ki.IV: 103} Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of echoes. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in echoes going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of optical aberrations. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in optical aberrations going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of reflections. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in reflections going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of mirages. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in mirages going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the moon's reflection in water. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in the moon's reflection in water going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of phantom emanations. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in phantom emanations going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is limitless and boundless. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in that which is limitless and boundless, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without emancipation and nonemancipation. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in that which is without emancipation and nonemancipation, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without subtraction and addition. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in that which is without subtraction and addition, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without coming. [F.316.a] They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in that which is without coming, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without acceptance and rejection. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in that which is without acceptance and rejection, going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without conjunction, disjunction, embracing, and nonembracing. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, in that which is without conjunction, disjunction, embracing, and nonembracing, going and coming are not apprehended.

36.30 “Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without self.⁴⁵² They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the self, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is without⁴⁵³ sentient beings, life forms, living creatures, life, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, agents, petitioners, instigators, experiencers, knowers, or viewers. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in viewers [and so forth], which are themselves absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming?

36.31 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of permanence. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in permanence, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of happiness, self, {Ki.IV: 104} and pleasantness. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in pleasantness [and so forth], which are themselves absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming?

36.32 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of impermanence. They [F.316.b] do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in impermanence, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of suffering, nonself, and unpleasantness. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in unpleasantness [and so forth], which are themselves absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming?

36.33 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of desire. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the entity of desire, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of hatred. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the entity of hatred, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of delusion. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the entity of delusion, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of false views. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the entity of false views, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming?

36.34 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the real nature. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the real nature going and coming are not apprehended. Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the realm of phenomena, the very limit of reality, sameness, and the inconceivable [expanse]. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the inconceivable realm [and so forth], going and coming are not apprehended.

36.35 “Subhūti, all phenomena have a nature that is unmoving. [F.317.a] They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in that which is unmoving, going and coming are not apprehended.

36.36 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of physical forms. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in physical forms, which are themselves absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in consciousness [and so forth], which are themselves absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? {Ki.IV: 105}

- 36.37 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the perfection of generosity. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the perfection of generosity, which is itself absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the perfection of wisdom [and so forth], which are themselves absolutely nonexistent, how could there be going or coming?
- 36.38 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the emptiness of internal phenomena, which is itself absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth], which are themselves absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming?
- 36.39 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the applications of mindfulness. [F.317.b] They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the applications of mindfulness, which are themselves absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the path. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the path [and those other causal attributes], which are themselves absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming?
- 36.40 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and those other fruitional attributes], which are themselves absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming?
- 36.41 “Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, which is itself absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 106} They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, [F.318.a] in individual enlightenment [and those other fruits], which are themselves absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming? Subhūti, all phenomena are of the nature of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They do not transgress this nature. If you ask why, Subhūti, in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, which is itself absolutely not apprehended, how could there be going or coming?"

36.42 "Blessed Lord, who will have conviction in this perfection of wisdom, which is so profound?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "those bodhisattva great beings who have ripened the roots of virtuous action, practicing in the presence of the lord buddhas of the past for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, who have venerated many buddhas, and who have been accepted by a spiritual mentor will have conviction in this profound perfection of wisdom."

36.43 This completes the thirty-sixth chapter from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

CHAPTER 37

- 37.1 “Blessed Lord, what will be the nature of those bodhisattva great beings who will have conviction in this profound perfection of wisdom? What will be their indications, signs, and forms?”
- 37.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “those bodhisattva great beings who will have conviction in this profound perfection of wisdom will have a nature that is isolated, owing to their elimination of desire. Those bodhisattva great beings [F.318.b] will have a nature that is isolated, owing to their elimination of hatred and delusion. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will have a nature that is isolated from the indications of desire. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will have a nature that is isolated from the indications of hatred and delusion.
- 37.3 “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will have a nature that is isolated from the signs of desire. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will have a nature that is isolated from the signs of hatred and delusion. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will have a nature that is isolated from the forms of desire. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will have a nature that is isolated from the forms of hatred and delusion.” {Ki.IV: 107}
- 37.4 “Blessed Lord, what will be the disposition of those bodhisattva great beings who comprehend this profound perfection of wisdom?”
- “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who comprehend this profound perfection of wisdom will have the disposition of all-aspect omniscience,” replied the Blessed One.
- 37.5 “Blessed Lord, will those bodhisattva great beings who have the disposition of all-aspect omniscience be supportive of beings?”
- “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Those bodhisattva great beings who have the disposition of all-aspect omniscience will be supportive of beings.”

37.6 “Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings achieve that which is difficult, donning this armor and proclaiming that they should bring all beings to final nirvāṇa, although they do not apprehend beings or anything designated as a being.”

“Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied [F.319.a] the Blessed One. “Those bodhisattva great beings who have donned this armor, proclaiming that they should bring all beings to final nirvāṇa, achieve that which is difficult.

37.7 “Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with physical forms. If you ask why, Subhūti, physical forms are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is said not to be associated with physical forms. Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. If you ask why, Subhūti, consciousness [and so forth] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is said not to be associated with consciousness [and so forth].

37.8 “Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. If you ask why, Subhūti, the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is said not to be associated with the links of dependent origination [and so forth].

37.9 “Subhūti, this armor is not associated with the self. It is not associated with beings. It is not associated with life forms. It is not associated with living creatures. It is not associated with life. It is not associated with individual personalities. It is not associated with human beings. It is not associated with people. It is not associated with actors. It is not associated with experiencers. It is not associated with knowers, and it is not associated with viewers. If you ask why, Subhūti, [F.319.b] viewers [and those other postulated subjects] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is said not to be associated with viewers [and so forth].

37.10 “Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with the perfection of generosity. If you ask why, Subhūti, the perfection of generosity is absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor is said not to be associated with the perfection of generosity. Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor is said not to be associated with the perfection of wisdom [and so forth].

37.11 “Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with the emptiness of internal phenomena. If you ask why, Subhūti, the emptiness of internal phenomena is absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor is said not to be associated with the emptiness of internal phenomena. Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. If you ask why, Subhūti, the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor is said not to be associated with the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth].

37.12 “Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with the applications of mindfulness. If you ask why, Subhūti, [F.320.a] the applications of mindfulness are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is said not to be associated with the applications of mindfulness. Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. If you ask why, Subhūti, the noble eightfold path [and so forth] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor is said not to be associated with the noble eightfold path [and so forth].

37.13 “Subhūti, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is not associated with [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.IV: 108} If you ask why, Subhūti, all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are absolutely nonexistent, as indeed is the armor of the bodhisattvas nonexistent. Accordingly, this armor of bodhisattva great beings is said not to be associated with all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

37.14 “Subhūti, the armor of those bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom and who don the armor, proclaiming that they themselves should bring all beings to final nirvāṇa, is not associated with anything.”

37.15 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who wear the armor, proclaiming that they should bring all beings to final nirvāṇa, should not be in fear of the two abodes, which are the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who wear the armor, proclaiming that they should bring all beings to final nirvāṇa, have no chance of lapsing into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. [F.320.b] That could not happen! If one were to ask why, bodhisattva great beings do not don this armor for the sake of beings limited by boundaries.”

37.16 The Blessed One asked, “Considering what objective do you say, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wear such armor and practice this profound perfection of wisdom should not be in fear of the two abodes, which are the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas?”

37.17 “Blessed Lord, it is because bodhisattva great beings have not donned this armor for the sake of a small or limited number of beings. They have not donned this armor for the sake of small or limited knowledge. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings have donned this armor in order that they might bring all beings to final nirvāṇa. Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings have donned this armor for the sake of the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience.”

37.18 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings have not donned this armor for the sake of a small or limited number of beings. They have not donned this armor for the sake of small or limited knowledge. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings have donned this armor in order that they might bring all beings to final nirvāṇa, and for the sake of the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience.”

37.19 “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is absolutely profound. It should not be cultivated by anyone. There is nothing that should be cultivated, and there is nothing in which it should be cultivated. If one were to ask why, {Ki.IV: 109} [F.321.a] Blessed Lord, in this profound perfection of wisdom one can apprehend nothing absolutely existent that cultivates, nothing that is to be cultivated, and nothing by which cultivation is made. Blessed Lord, the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the cultivation of space. Blessed Lord, so it is that the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the cultivation of all phenomena. Blessed Lord, so it is that the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the cultivation of the nonexistent. Blessed Lord, so it is that the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the cultivation of nonappropriation. Blessed Lord, so it is that the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of cultivation.”⁴⁵⁴

37.20 “In that case, Subhūti,” asked the Blessed One, “with respect to which phenomena is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom a breaking down of cultivation?”

- 37.21 “Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of physical forms. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the self. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, and viewers. [F.321.b]
- 37.22 “Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the perfection of generosity. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the emptiness of internal phenomena. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities.
- 37.23 “Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the applications of mindfulness. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. {Ki.IV: 110}
- 37.24 “Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, [F.322.a] the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. Blessed Lord, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of all-aspect omniscience.”

37.25 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of physical forms. Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the sense fields, the sensory elements, {Ki.IV: 111} and the links of dependent origination. Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the self. Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, and viewers.

37.26 “Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of all the perfections. [F.322.b] Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of all the aspects of emptiness.

37.27 “Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways.

37.28 “Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. Subhūti, this cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is the breaking down of the cultivation of [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

37.29 Then the Blessed One further addressed the venerable Subhūti as follows: “In this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible should investigate this profound perfection of wisdom to determine, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings are without attachment to this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should investigate the perfection of meditative concentration, [F.323.a] the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity to determine if bodhisattva great beings are without attachment to the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity.

37.30 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should investigate the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, to determine if bodhisattva great beings are without attachment to the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth].

37.31 “Bodhisattva great beings should investigate the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment to determine whether they are not fixated on the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. Bodhisattva great beings should investigate the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways to determine if they are without attachment to the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth].

37.32 “Bodhisattva great beings should investigate the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [F.323.b] to determine if they are without attachment to the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. Bodhisattva great beings should investigate [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, to determine if they are without attachment to all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

37.33 “When those bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible practice this profound perfection of wisdom, they should investigate if they are not viewing the words spoken by others and the intimations revealed by others to be of import. When those bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible practice this profound perfection of wisdom, they should investigate if they are not going forward with faith in others. When those bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible practice this profound perfection of wisdom, {Ki.IV: 112} they should investigate if they are not being captivated by the mind-sets of desire, and if they are not being captivated by the mind-sets of hatred and delusion. When those bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible practice this profound perfection of wisdom, they should investigate if they are not diverging from the perfection of generosity, if they are not diverging from the perfection of ethical discipline, if they are not diverging from the perfection of tolerance, if they are not diverging from the perfection of perseverance, if they are not diverging from the perfection of meditative concentration, and if they are not diverging from the perfection of wisdom.

37.34 “If, when those bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible practice this profound perfection of wisdom, they are not afraid or terrified, they do not grow fearful, they are not cowed or intimidated, [F.324.a] their minds are not dissuaded, and they delight in hearing this profound perfection of wisdom—and having studied it, they take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, and earnestly apply it in an authentic manner—then, Subhūti, you should know that those bodhisattva great beings in their former lives, too, will have asked questions about and investigated this profound perfection of wisdom, taking up, upholding, mastering, and focusing their attention correctly on it.

37.35 “If you ask why, it is because those bodhisattva great beings will not be afraid or terrified, they will not grow fearful, and they will not be discouraged or intimidated when this profound perfection of wisdom is explained. Their minds will not be turned away and, having heard it, they will purposefully take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it.”

37.36 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings will not be afraid or terrified, and not be cowed or intimidated when this profound perfection of wisdom is revealed, then, Blessed Lord, how should those bodhisattva great beings appraise this perfection of wisdom?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “those bodhisattva great beings should appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with their minds intent on all-aspect omniscience.”

37.37 “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with their minds intent on all-aspect omniscience?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, [F.324.b] “bodhisattva great beings appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with minds intent on emptiness. Subhūti, they appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with their minds intent on signlessness and wishlessness, {Ki.IV: 113} with their minds intent on space, with their minds intent on nonarising and nonceasing, with their minds intent on nonaffliction and nonpurification, with their minds intent on the real nature, with their minds intent on the realm of phenomena, with their minds intent on the very limit of reality, with their minds intent on the inconceivable realm, and with their minds intent on nonconditioning. Bodhisattva great beings appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with their minds intent on dreams and reflections, and with their minds intent on echoes, mirages, magical displays, and phantom emanations.” [B49]

37.38 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with minds intent on emptiness and if they appraise this profound perfection of wisdom with their minds intent on signlessness, wishlessness, space, nonarising, nonceasing, nonaffliction, nonpurification, the real nature, the realm of phenomena, the very limit of reality, sameness, the inconceivable realm, nonconditioning, dreams, reflections, echoes, mirages, magical displays, and phantom emanations, [F.325.a] then, Blessed Lord, do those bodhisattva great beings appraise physical forms? Do they appraise feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? Do they appraise the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination? Do they appraise any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment? Do they appraise the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways? Do they appraise the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas? Do they appraise [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?”

37.39 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings do not appraise physical forms. They do not appraise feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not appraise the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. They do not appraise any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They do not appraise the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.325.b] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. {Ki.IV: 114} They do not appraise the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not appraise [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because this all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] has not been created, destroyed, or brought into being by anyone. It has not come from anywhere and it will not go anywhere. It does not dwell in any direction, nor does it dwell in any place—it does not dwell anywhere at all. In it no number is apprehended. Going and coming are not apprehended. There is no one indeed who can attain consummate buddhahood with respect to that in which number is not apprehended, and going and coming are not apprehended.

37.40 “[Manifestly perfect buddhahood] is not attained by means of physical forms. Nor is it attained by means of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; nor by means of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; nor by means of the perfection of generosity; nor by means of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom; nor by means of the emptiness of internal phenomena; nor by means of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; nor by means of the applications of mindfulness; nor by means of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, [F.326.a] or the noble eightfold path; nor by means of [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

37.41 “If you ask why, it is because the nature of physical forms is indeed all-aspect omniscience. The nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is indeed all-aspect omniscience. The nature [of all causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, is indeed all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the real nature of physical forms and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature. The real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. The real nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. The real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. The real nature of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, [F.326.b] the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature."

37.42 This completes the thirty-seventh chapter from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

CHAPTER 38: [THE REAL NATURE]

38.1 Then the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and the realm of form brought many divine sandalwood powders, and divine blue lotuses, day lotuses, night lotuses, and white lotuses, and they scattered these toward the Blessed One. Having scattered them, {Ki.IV: 115} they approached the place where the Blessed One was seated, prostrated their heads at his feet, and took their place to one side. Having taken their place to one side, those gods inhabiting the realm of desire and the realm of form then asked the Blessed One the following:

38.2 “Blessed Lord, how do the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas teach, on the basis of this profound perfection of wisdom, that the nature of physical forms is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed physical forms? [How do they teach that] the nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed consciousness [and so forth]? [How do they teach that] the nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the links of dependent origination [and so forth]? [How do they teach that] the nature of the perfection of generosity is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the perfection of generosity? [How do they teach that] the nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, [F.327.a] the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]? [How do they teach that the nature of] the emptiness of internal phenomena is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the emptiness of internal phenomena? [How do they teach that the nature of the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]? [How do they teach that] the nature of the applications of mindfulness is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the applications of mindfulness? [How do they teach that] the nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the noble eightfold path [and so forth]? [How do they teach that] the nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the formless absorptions [and so forth]? [How do they teach that] the nature of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas is all-aspect omniscience, and that all-aspect omniscience is indeed the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]?

- 38.3 “[How do they teach that] the real nature of physical forms and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [F.327.b] are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the perfection of generosity and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two. [How do they teach that] the real nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two. [How do they teach that] the real nature of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the applications of mindfulness and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, [F.328.a] and the noble eightfold path, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two? [How do they teach that] the real nature of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, the pratyekabuddhas, the bodhisattvas, and the buddhas, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature—that they are not two things and cannot be divided into two?

38.4 “That is to say, this perfection of wisdom, the enlightenment of the tathāgatas, is profound, hard to see, and hard to comprehend. It cannot be scrutinized; it is not within the range of sophistry. It is at peace, subtle, and delicate,⁴⁵⁵ and may be known by those who are learned and realized. It is difficult for any mundane [beings] to have conviction in it.” [F.328.b]

38.5 The Blessed One then replied to those gods inhabiting the realm of desire and the realm of form, “Divine princes, it is so! It is so! Divine princes, the nature of physical forms is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed physical forms. The nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed consciousness [and so forth]. The nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The nature of the perfection of generosity is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the perfection of generosity. {Ki.IV: 116} The nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. [The nature of] the emptiness of internal phenomena is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the emptiness of internal phenomena. [The nature of the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. The nature of the applications of mindfulness is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the applications of mindfulness. The nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. The nature of the truths of the noble ones, [F.329.a] the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the formless absorptions [and so forth]. The nature of the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas is all-aspect omniscience, and all-aspect omniscience is indeed the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth].

- 38.6 “The real nature of physical forms and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the perfection of generosity and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, [F.329.b] and the perfection of wisdom, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the applications of mindfulness and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, [F.330.a] great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, the pratyekabuddhas, the bodhisattvas, and the buddhas, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two.

- 38.7 “Divine princes, it is on seeing that ultimate meaning that the mind of the Tathāgata was inclined toward carefree inaction,⁴⁵⁶ and not toward the teaching of the Dharma. If you ask why, it is because this enlightenment, the Dharma of the tathāgatas, is profound, {Ki.IV: 117} hard to discern, and hard to comprehend—it cannot be scrutinized and it is not within the range of sophistry. It is at peace, subtle, and delicate, and it may only be known by those who are learned and realized. It is difficult for any mundane beings to have conviction in it. Manifestly perfect buddhahood has not been attained by anyone. Manifestly perfect buddhahood has never been attained.

Manifestly perfect buddhahood has not been attained anywhere. This is the profundity of all phenomena, in which the habitual ideas of duality do not at all exist.

38.8 “Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of space. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the real nature. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the realm of phenomena. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the very limit of reality. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the inconceivable realm. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of limitless and infinite [reality]. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of nonmotion. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of nonarising, noncessation, and [F.330.b] the absence of consummate enlightenment. This doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of nonaffliction, nonpurification, and the absence of consummate enlightenment. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of nonconditioning and the absence of consummate enlightenment.

38.9 “Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the self. This doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, and viewers. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of physical forms. This doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the perfection of generosity. This doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the emptiness of internal phenomena. This doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the applications of mindfulness. This doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions.

Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways to liberation—emptiness, [F.331.a] signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. Divine princes, this doctrine is profound owing to the profundity of all-aspect omniscience.”

38.10 Then the gods said, “Blessed Lord, it is wonderful that this Dharma, in which it is difficult for any worldly beings to have conviction, has been revealed. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, this doctrine has not been revealed so that physical forms might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. {Ki.IV: 118} It has not been revealed so that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped.

38.11 “This profound Dharma has not been revealed so that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa might be grasped or so that it might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, [F.331.b] the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped.

38.12 “Blessed Lord, the world indulges in grasping, saying, ‘I identify with physical forms.⁴⁵⁷ I possess physical forms. I identify with feelings. I possess feelings. I identify with perceptions. I possess perceptions. I identify with formative predispositions. I possess formative predispositions. I identify with consciousness. I possess consciousness. I identify with the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination. I possess the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. I identify with the perfection of generosity. I should perfect the perfection of generosity. I identify with the perfection of ethical discipline. I should perfect the perfection of ethical discipline. I identify with the perfection of tolerance. I should perfect the perfection of tolerance. I identify with the perfection of perseverance. I should perfect the perfection of perseverance. I identify with the perfection of meditative concentration. I should perfect the perfection of meditative concentration. I identify with the perfection of wisdom. I should perfect the perfection of wisdom. I identify with the emptiness of internal phenomena. I should cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena. I identify with [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. I should cultivate the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. I identify with the applications of mindfulness. I should practice the applications of mindfulness. I identify with the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, [F.332.a] and the noble eightfold path. I should practice the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. I identify with the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. I should practice the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. I identify with the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. I should practice the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. I identify with the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. I will become one who enters the stream to nirvāṇa. I identify with the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth. I will become one who is destined for only one more rebirth. I identify with the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth. I will become one who is no longer subject to rebirth. I identify with arhatship. I will become an arhat. I identify with individual enlightenment. I will become a pratyekabuddha. I identify with all-aspect omniscience. I will become omniscient.’ ”

- 38.13 “Divine princes, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Divine princes, this Dharma has not been revealed so that physical forms might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, [F.332.b] and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. {Ki.IV: 119} It has not been revealed so that the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa might be grasped or so that it might not be grasped. It has not been revealed so that [the other goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, might be grasped or so that they might not be grasped.

- 38.14 “Divine princes, those who practice order that they might grasp or not grasp physical forms; those who practice in order that they might grasp or not grasp feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; those who practice in order that they might grasp or not grasp the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination; those who practice in order that they might grasp or not grasp all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; those who practice in order that they might grasp or not grasp the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; those who practice in order that they might grasp or not grasp the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and [F.333.a] the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and those who practice in order that they might grasp or not grasp [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, cannot cultivate the perfection of generosity. They cannot cultivate the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They cannot cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena. They cannot cultivate [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They cannot cultivate the applications of mindfulness. They cannot cultivate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They cannot cultivate [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

38.15 Then, the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this Dharma is compatible with all phenomena. If one were to ask what phenomena this Dharma is compatible with, this Dharma is compatible with the perfection of wisdom. This Dharma is compatible with the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. This Dharma is compatible with the emptiness of internal phenomena. This Dharma is compatible with [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. This Dharma is compatible with the applications of mindfulness. This Dharma is compatible with the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, [F.333.b] the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. This Dharma is compatible with the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. This Dharma is compatible with the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. This Dharma is compatible with [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

38.16 “Nowhere is this Dharma obstructed. If you ask with regard to what it is unobstructed, it is unobstructed with regard to physical forms. It is unobstructed with regard to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. It is unobstructed with regard to the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination. It is unobstructed with regard to all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. It is unobstructed with regard to the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. It is unobstructed with regard to the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. [F.334.a] It is unobstructed with regard to [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

38.17 “This Dharma has the defining characteristic of not being obstructed, owing to its sameness with space, owing to its sameness with the real nature, owing to its sameness with the abiding realm of phenomena, owing to its sameness with the very limit of reality, owing to its sameness with the inconceivable realm, owing to its sameness with emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, owing to its sameness with nonarising and noncessation, and owing to its sameness with nonaffliction and nonpurification.

38.18 “This Dharma is nonarising, owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of physical forms; owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; {Ki.IV: 120} owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination; owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and owing to the nonapprehension of the arising of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

38.19 “This Dharma is groundless, owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of physical forms; owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination; [F.334.b] owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and owing to the nonapprehension of the ground of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

38.20 Then the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and those inhabiting the realm of form said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this elder Subhūti imitates the Blessed One. If one were to ask why, it is because whatever the elder Subhūti is teaching, he teaches all phenomena commencing with emptiness. He teaches them commencing with signlessness and wishlessness.”

38.21 Then the venerable Subhūti addressed the gods inhabiting the realm of desire gods and those inhabiting the realm of form as follows: “Divine princes, with regard to your words, ‘Blessed Lord, this elder Subhūti imitates the Blessed One,’ if one were to ask in what manner of imitation the elder Subhūti imitates the Tathāgata, [this implies that] the elder Subhūti imitates the real nature of the Tathāgata. Just as the real nature of the Tathāgata arises from nowhere, and departs nowhere, so the real nature of the elder Subhūti also arises from nowhere and departs nowhere, in which case the elder Subhūti has imitated the Tathāgata from the very beginning.

38.22 “The real nature of the Tathāgata [F.335.a] is also the real nature of all phenomena. The real nature of all phenomena is also the real nature of the Tathāgata. Yet, the real nature of the Tathāgata is without real nature. It is in this manner that the elder Subhūti imitates the Tathāgata. Since the elder Subhūti dwells in accordance with the real nature of the Tathāgata, he does imitate the Tathāgata.

38.23 “Just as the real nature of the Tathāgata is unchanging and nonconceptual, in that same manner the real nature of the elder Subhūti is also unchanging and nonconceptual.

38.24 “Just as the real nature of the Tathāgata is unobstructed in all respects, in that same manner the real nature of all phenomena is also unobstructed in all respects. The real nature of the Tathāgata and the real nature of all phenomena are one and the same real nature. {Ki.IV: 121} They are not two things and cannot be divided into two.

38.25 “This real nature is uncreated. There is nothing at all of which it is not the real nature. Since there is nothing at all of which it is not the real nature, this real nature is not two things and cannot be divided into two. So it is in this way that the elder Subhūti imitates the Tathāgata.

38.26 “Just as the real nature of the Tathāgata is unchanging and nonconceptual in all respects, the real nature of the elder Subhūti is also unchanging and nonconceptual in all respects. Just as the real nature of the Tathāgata is undifferentiated, indivisible, nondistinguishable, and nonapprehensible, in the same way the real nature of the elder Subhūti is also undifferentiated, indivisible, nondistinguishable, and nonapprehensible. So it is in this way that the elder Subhūti imitates the Tathāgata. [F.335.b]

38.27 “Just as the real nature of the Tathāgata is not distinct from the real nature of all phenomena, and is always the real nature, never not the real nature, in the same way the elder Subhūti, not being different, imitates the Tathāgata and yet he does not imitate anything at all. So it is in this way that the elder Subhūti imitates the Tathāgata.

38.28 “It is said that he imitates the Tathāgata. That is to say, the real nature of the Tathāgata is sameness, owing to the sameness of the real nature of the past. The real nature of the past is sameness, owing to the sameness of the real nature of the Tathāgata. The real nature of the Tathāgata is sameness, owing to the sameness of the real nature of the future. The real nature of the future is sameness, owing to the sameness of the real nature of the Tathāgata. The real nature of the Tathāgata is sameness, owing to the sameness of the real nature of the present. The real nature of the present is sameness, owing to the sameness of the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the past, the future, and the present, and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are one and the same real nature. They are not two things and cannot be divided into two.

38.29 “The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of physical forms. The real nature of physical forms accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of physical forms and the real nature of the Tathāgata are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. The real nature of consciousness [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of consciousness [and so forth], [F.336.a] and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination. The real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two. {Ki.IV:122}

38.30 “The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the perfection of generosity. The real nature of the perfection of generosity accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the perfection of generosity and the real nature of the Tathāgata are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. The real nature of the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the perfection of wisdom [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two.

- 38.31 “The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena. The real nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena and the real nature of the Tathāgata are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. The real nature of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two. [F.336.b]
- 38.32 “The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the applications of mindfulness. The real nature of the applications of mindfulness accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the applications of mindfulness and the real nature of the Tathāgata are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. The real nature of the noble eightfold path [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the noble eightfold path [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two.
- 38.33 “The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers. The real nature of extrasensory powers [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of extrasensory powers [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two. The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. [F.337.a] The real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two. {Ki.IV: 123}

- 38.34 “The real nature of the Tathāgata accords with the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. The real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] accords with the real nature of the Tathāgata. So it is that the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], and the real nature of the Tathāgata, are not two things and cannot be divided into two.
- 38.35 “This is the real nature of Subhūti and of the Tathāgata, through which bodhisattva great beings, after attaining consummate buddhahood with regard to the real nature, acquire the title tathāgata.”
- 38.36 When [Subhūti] had delivered the exegesis of this chapter on the real nature, this great trichiliocosm shook in six ways. It shook, shuddered, and juddered. It rocked, reeled, and tottered. It quivered, careened, and convulsed. It trembled, throbbed, and quaked. It rumbled, roared, and thundered. It faltered, lurched, and staggered. As its eastern side reared up its western side plunged down, as its western side reared up its eastern side plunged down, as its southern side reared up its northern side plunged down, as its northern side reared up its southern side plunged down, as its edges reared up its center plunged down, and as its center reared up its edges plunged down.
- 38.37 Then the gods inhabiting the realm of desire and the realm of form scattered, scattered more vigorously, and scattered with utmost vigor divine sandalwood powders toward the Blessed One and the elder Subhūti, and said, “Blessed Lord, it is wonderful that this elder Subhūti imitates the Tathāgata, in accordance with the real nature of the Tathāgata!”
- 38.38 Then the venerable [F.337.b] Subhūti, picking up the thread of this conversation, addressed the gods as follows: “So it is, divine princes, that the elder Subhūti does not imitate physical forms. He does not imitate anything other than physical forms. He does not imitate the real nature of physical forms. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of physical forms. He does not imitate feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. He does not imitate anything other than consciousness [and so forth]. He does not imitate the real nature of consciousness [and so forth]. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of consciousness [and so forth].
- 38.39 “He does not imitate the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. He does not imitate anything other than the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. He does not imitate the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth].

- 38.40 “He does not imitate all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, {Ki.IV: 124} signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. He does not imitate anything other than the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. He does not imitate the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. [F.338.a]
- 38.41 “He does not imitate [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. He does not imitate anything other than all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. He does not imitate the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].
- 38.42 “He does not imitate conditioned phenomena. He does not imitate anything other than conditioned phenomena. He does not imitate the real nature of conditioned phenomena. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of conditioned phenomena. He does not imitate unconditioned phenomena. He does not imitate anything other than unconditioned phenomena. He does not imitate the real nature of unconditioned phenomena. He does not imitate anything other than the real nature of unconditioned phenomena.
- 38.43 “If you ask why, it is because all those phenomena that one imitates, those phenomena by which one imitates, those phenomena that one has imitated, those phenomena by which one has imitated, those phenomena that one will imitate, and those phenomena by which one will imitate are all are nonexistent and nonapprehensible.”
- 38.44 Thereupon the venerable Śāradvatīputra said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this real nature of all phenomena, the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, the reality, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, the maturity of all phenomena, and the very limit of reality are profound! In it physical forms are not apprehended, and the real nature of physical forms is not apprehended. If physical forms are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of physical forms be apprehended! In it feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not apprehended, and the real nature of consciousness [and so forth] is not apprehended. If consciousness [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of consciousness [and so forth] be apprehended!

38.45 “[In it] the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are not apprehended, and the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth] is not apprehended. [F.338.b] If the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth] be apprehended!

38.46 “[In it] all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are not apprehended, and the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] is not apprehended. If the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] be apprehended!

38.47 “[In it the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not apprehended, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is not apprehended. If all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] be apprehended!”

38.48 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “This real nature is profound. In it physical forms are not apprehended, and the real nature of physical forms is not apprehended. If physical forms are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of physical forms be apprehended! In it feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not apprehended, and the real nature of consciousness [and so forth] is not apprehended. If consciousness [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of consciousness [and so forth] be apprehended! {Ki.IV: 125}

38.49 “[In it] the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are not apprehended, [F.339.a] and the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth] is not apprehended. If the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth] be apprehended!

- 38.50 “[In it] all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are not apprehended, and the real nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] is not apprehended. If the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] be apprehended!
- 38.51 “[In it the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not apprehended, and the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] is not apprehended. If all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are themselves not apprehended, how could the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] be apprehended!”
- 38.52 When the exegesis of this chapter concerning the real nature, the unmistakable real nature, and the one and only real nature had been delivered, the minds of two hundred monks were liberated from contaminants, without further grasping [that would lead to subsequent rebirth]. Five hundred nuns cultivated the eye of the Dharma, unsullied and untainted with respect to all phenomena. Five thousand bodhisattvas—gods and humans—acquired the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising. The minds of sixty bodhisattvas having a debased Dharma were liberated from contaminants, without further grasping [that would lead to subsequent rebirth].
- 38.53 [Regarding the last mentioned, the Blessed One then said], “Śāradvatīputra, those bodhisattva great beings have venerated five hundred buddhas—that is to say, in all respects they have made offerings, maintained ethical discipline, cultivated tolerance, undertaken perseverance, achieved meditative concentration, and cultivated wisdom, and yet they have not been favored with the perfection of wisdom, and they have not been favored with skill in means. For these reasons, they differentiate, saying, ‘I have given a gift. This is a gift. I should give this one a gift. This is ethical discipline. I [F.339.b] should maintain it. This is tolerance. I should cultivate it. This is perseverance. I should undertake it. This is meditative concentration. I should be absorbed in it. This is wisdom. I should cultivate it!’ Separated from the perfection of wisdom and without being favored with skill in means, they say, ‘I should dispense gifts. I should maintain ethical discipline. I should cultivate tolerance. I should undertake perseverance. I should be absorbed in meditative concentration. I should cultivate wisdom.’ They engage with diverse notions, so that they do not apprehend by means of nondifferentiation.⁴⁵⁸ This is why they have not entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas. Since they have not entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they have attained the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa and they have attained [the other fruits], up to and including arhatship.

38.54 “Śāradvatīputra, although the path of those bodhisattva great beings does possess emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, they are still separated from the perfection of wisdom and have not yet been favored with skill in means, for which reasons, after they have actualized the very limit of reality, they will become śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas.” {Ki.IV: 126}

38.55 “Blessed Lord, why is it that those who seem to cultivate the nature of phenomena that is emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, but are still separated from the perfection of wisdom and have not yet been favored with skill in means, [merely] actualize the very limit of reality and become śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas, whereas bodhisattvas who have been favored with skill in means also cultivate the nature of phenomena that is emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, and, in addition, depend upon skill in means and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

38.56 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, [F.340.a] “in this regard, there are some persons whose minds are without all-aspect omniscience and who absolutely cultivate the nature of phenomena that is emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, but they [merely] become śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas because they are without skill in means. Again, Śāradvatīputra, there are bodhisattva great beings whose minds are not without all-aspect omniscience, who cultivate [the nature of] phenomena that is emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, and then enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment because they are not without skill in means. As an analogy, Śāradvatīputra, suppose there were a wingless bird with a body one hundred yojanas, two hundred yojanas, three hundred yojanas, four hundred yojanas, or five hundred yojanas in size, who wished to migrate here from the god realm of Trayastriṃśa, thinking, ‘I should dwell in Jambudvīpa!’ And having taken off from the god realm of Trayastriṃśa, if that bird were to have second thoughts on the way down, considering, ‘Now I should stay in the god realm of Trayastriṃśa,’ do you think, Śāradvatīputra, that this [wingless] bird would be able to resettle in the god realm of Trayastriṃśa?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

38.57 The Blessed One continued, “If this [wingless bird], while descending from there, were to think, ‘Oh! May I land in Jambudvīpa, without being wounded or injured at all!’ do you think, Śāradvatīputra, that this [wingless] bird would land in Jambudvīpa, without being wounded or injured?”

- 38.58 “No Blessed Lord! It would fall to Jambudvīpa, wounded and injured, and die, or experience mortal sufferings. [F.340.b] If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because this is undoubtedly what would happen to any bird whatsoever, with such a large body and no wings.”
- 38.59 “It is so, Śāradvatīputra. It is so!” continued the Blessed One. “However much bodhisattvas may aspire to dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, be absorbed in meditative concentration, and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, over eons as numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, and however much they set their minds upon that, even though the sustenance they have obtained might indeed be limitless, if they are separated from perfection of wisdom and have not been favored with skill in means they will descend to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. {Ki.IV: 127} If you ask why, it is because by dispensing generosity, maintaining ethical discipline, cultivating tolerance, undertaking perseverance, and achieving meditative concentration without the mind set on all-aspect omniscience, those bodhisattvas will descend to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas because they are separated from perfection of wisdom and have not been favored with skill in means.
- 38.60 “Moreover, Śāradvatīputra, when bodhisattvas consider, grasp, and conceptualize the ethical disciplines, meditative stabilities, wisdom, and liberation of the tathāgatas of the past, future, and present, along with their seeing the wisdom of liberation, if they do not understand the ethical discipline of the tathāgatas, and if they do not understand their meditative stabilities, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation, owing to their lack of understanding and lack of comprehension, they will hear talk about emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness and tranquilly conceptualize about them; and having tranquilly conceptualized about them, they will even dedicate these toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.341.a] Bodhisattvas, making such dedications, will settle into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because those who dedicate these roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment will undoubtedly incur this outcome because they are separated from the perfection of wisdom and are without skill in means.
- 38.61 “In this regard, Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings who, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, and are absorbed in meditative concentration, without being separated from the mind set on all-aspect omniscience, will not be without the perfection of wisdom and skill in means. They will not conceptualize the ethical discipline of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, or their meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation. If they do not conceptualize the meditative stability of emptiness, do not conceptualize the meditative stability of signlessness, and do not conceptualize the meditative stability of wishlessness, you should know, Śāradvatīputra, that those bodhisattva great beings will not settle into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. {Ki.IV: 128} If you ask why, it is because those bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, have dispensed generosity but have not conceptualized it. They have maintained ethical discipline but they have not conceptualized it. They have cultivated tolerance but they have not conceptualized it. They have undertaken perseverance but they have not conceptualized it. They have become absorbed in meditative concentration but they have not conceptualized it. They have cultivated wisdom but they have not conceptualized it. [F.341.b] They have not conceptualized the ethical discipline of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, or their meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation. They have cultivated the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness but have not conceptualized them.

38.62 “Śāradvatīputra, those who, with a mind free from conceptualization, dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivate wisdom; cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena; cultivate [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; cultivate the applications of mindfulness; cultivate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; cultivate the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; cultivate the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; cultivate the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and cultivate [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are skilled in the means of bodhisattva great beings.” [B50]

38.63 “Blessed Lord, as I understand the meaning of the words spoken by the Blessed One, there is no doubt that if bodhisattva great beings, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, are not without the perfection of wisdom and [F.342.a] skill in means, they will attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because those bodhisattva great beings, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, apprehend nothing at all that would attain consummate buddhahood, or through which they would attain consummate buddhahood, whether it be physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, the perfections, the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, or all-aspect omniscience.

38.64 “Blessed Lord, those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and who are separated from the perfection of wisdom and skill in means, [should know that] their attainment of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is in doubt.⁴⁵⁹ {Ki.IV: 129} If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas have conceptualized all the generosity that they have dispensed. Similarly, they have conceptualized all the ethical discipline that they have maintained, the tolerance that they have cultivated, [F.342.b] the perseverance that they have undertaken, the meditative concentration in which they have become absorbed, and the wisdom which they have cultivated. This being the case, for this reason those noble sons or noble daughters should know that their attainment of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is in doubt.

38.65 “For this reason, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should not be separated from the perfection of wisdom and skill in means. Abiding in the perfection of wisdom and endowed with skill in means, and with a mind that is free of conceptualization, they should, without apprehending anything, dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivate wisdom. [Without apprehending anything], they should engage in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and engage in [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. [Without apprehending anything], they should engage with the applications of mindfulness, and engage with the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. [Without apprehending anything], they should practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. [Without apprehending anything], they should engage with the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, and cultivate the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. [Without apprehending anything], they should engage with the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, [F.343.a] the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. [Without apprehending anything], they should engage with [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

38.66 Then those gods inhabiting the realm of desire and the realm of form said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is hard to manifest because bodhisattva great beings should indeed attain consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena, and yet all those phenomena are indeed nonexistent and unapprehended.”

38.67 “Divine princes, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Divine princes, unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is hard to manifest. Divine princes, I have indeed attained consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena and in all ways. Ultimately, however, there is nothing at all that is apprehended with respect to which I would attain manifest perfect buddhahood, or by which I would attain manifest perfect buddhahood, or on the basis of which I should attain consummate buddhahood. {Ki.IV: 130} If you ask why, divine princes, it is because all phenomena are absolutely pure.”

38.68 Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, you have just said that unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is hard to manifest. As far as I understand and ponder the meaning of the words spoken by the Blessed One, it is not difficult, Blessed Lord, to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because there is nothing at all with respect to which consummate buddhahood would be attained, there is nothing by which consummate buddhahood would be attained, and there is nothing on the basis of which consummate buddhahood would be attained. [F.343.b] All dharmas are empty. All dharmas being empty, any such thing with respect to which consummate buddhahood would be attained, anything by which consummate buddhahood would be attained, and anything on the basis of which consummate buddhahood would be attained is nonexistent.

38.69 “If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because all dharmas are empty. All the dharmas to enhance or reduce which they dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivate wisdom; cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena; cultivate [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; cultivate the applications of mindfulness; cultivate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; cultivate [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; or cultivate [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are nonexistent. All those dharmas with respect to which consummate buddhahood would be attained, by which consummate buddhahood would be attained, and on the basis of which consummate buddhahood would be attained are indeed empty.

38.70 “Blessed Lord, for this reason, it would be easy for bodhisattva great beings to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because physical forms are empty of their own essential nature. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty of their own essential nature. The sense fields, sensory elements, [F.344.a] and links of dependent origination are empty of their own essential nature. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty of their own essential nature. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of their own essential nature. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty of their own essential nature.”

38.71 Then, the venerable Śāradvatīputra addressed the venerable Subhūti as follows: “Venerable Subhūti, it is for this very reason that it is difficult to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, Venerable Subhūti, just as space does not entertain the thought, ‘I must attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment,’ in the same way, Venerable Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings also do not entertain the thought, ‘I should attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’ If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are the same as space. {Ki.IV: 131} And yet, once bodhisattva great beings accept that all phenomena resemble space, they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If, even in the case of bodhisattva great beings who do not accept that all phenomena resemble space, [F.344.b] it were easy for them to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and it were easy to attain consummate enlightenment, and it were not difficult for them to attain consummate buddhahood, then bodhisattvas, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, would make irreversible progress toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. For this reason, Venerable Subhūti, it is difficult to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. One can discern that it is not easy to attain consummate buddhahood.”

38.72 Subhūti then asked, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that physical forms regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!” he replied.

38.73 “Do feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!”

38.74 “Well then, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that the sense fields, sensory elements, links of dependent origination, all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [F.345.a] great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Do [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!”

38.75 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that one might apprehend anything other than physical forms that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!”

38.76 “Well then, can one apprehend anything other than feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!”

38.77 “Well then, can one apprehend anything other than the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, {Ki.IV: 132} the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!”

38.78 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that [F.345.b] the real nature of physical forms regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Does the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Does the real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Does the real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Does the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Venerable Subhūti!”

38.79 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that there is anything other than the real nature of physical forms that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Is there anything other than the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Is there anything other than the real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? [F.346.a] Is there anything other than the real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Is there anything other than the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"No, Venerable Subhūti!"

38.80 "Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that the real nature regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?" {Ki.IV: 133}

"No, Venerable Subhūti!"

38.81 "Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that reality regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Do the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, the maturity with respect to all phenomena, the very limit of reality, and the inconceivable realm regress from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"No, Venerable Subhūti!"

38.82 "Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that there is anything other than the real nature that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"No, Venerable Subhūti!" [F.346.b]

38.83 "Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you think that there is anything other than reality, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, the maturity with respect to all phenomena, the very limit of reality, and the inconceivable realm that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"No, Venerable Subhūti!"

38.84 "So, if one cannot apprehend those phenomena as being truly established, what is that thing that regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

38.85 "According to this exposition of the elder Subhūti, which accords with the principle of [ultimate] reality and its aspects, there is no bodhisattva great being who regresses from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If that is the case, there is no gradation into the [differing degrees of] enlightenment of the three kinds of person involved in the vehicle of the bodhisattvas—those whom the tathāgatas have taught as constituting the three kinds of person involved in the vehicle of the bodhisattvas.⁴⁶⁰ According to the venerable Subhūti's exposition of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, bodhisattva great beings would become followers solely of the vehicle of the buddhas."

- 38.86 Then the venerable Pūrṇa Maitrāyaṇīputra said to the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, you should ask this elder Subhūti whether he holds that there is even a single bodhisattva!”
- 38.87 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the venerable Subhūti, “Venerable Subhūti, do you hold that bodhisattvas are followers [solely] of the vehicle of the buddhas?” {Ki.IV: 134}
- 38.88 Subhūti asked in return, “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you hold that according to the real nature there are three sorts of bodhisattvas—those who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas, those who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and those who follow the vehicle of the buddhas?” [F.347.a]
- “No, Venerable Subhūti!”
- 38.89 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, according to the real nature, can three sorts of bodhisattvas then be apprehended?
- “No, Venerable Subhūti!”
- 38.90 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, can the real nature be apprehended through one mode, two modes, or three modes?”
- “No, Venerable Subhūti!”
- 38.91 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, according to the real nature, can one observe even a single bodhisattva?”
- “No, Venerable Subhūti!”
- 38.92 “So, if one cannot apprehend those phenomena as being truly established, where, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, do you get the idea that this bodhisattva follows the vehicle of the śrāvakas, this bodhisattva follows the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and this bodhisattva follows the vehicle of the buddhas? It is in this manner, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, that bodhisattva great beings should analyze phenomena in accordance with the real nature and without distinctions. If bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, disheartened, or regretful, those bodhisattva great beings will be emancipated in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”
- 38.93 Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Subhūti, “Excellent, Subhūti! Excellent! By the power of the buddhas your words are inspired for the sake of bodhisattva great beings! Subhūti, it is in this manner that bodhisattva great beings should analyze phenomena according to the real nature and without distinctions. If bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, disheartened, or regretful, and if they are not afraid and terrified, [F.347.b] those bodhisattva great beings will be emancipated in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”
- 38.94 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, through which enlightenment will bodhisattva great beings who possess such attributes be emancipated?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “those bodhisattva great beings will be emancipated through unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.” {Ki.IV: 135}

38.95 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, how should bodhisattva great beings who seek emancipation in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment dwell?”

38.96 The Blessed One replied, “Their minds should dwell in a state of equanimity with respect to all beings. They should develop even-mindedness with respect to all beings, and they should not develop a state of mind that is imbalanced. They should apprehend all beings with even-mindedness, and not apprehend them with a mind that is imbalanced. They should develop great loving kindness and great compassion for all beings. They should not apprehend them with a mind that is coarse.⁴⁶¹ They should be without arrogance with respect to all beings and be without deceit with respect to all beings. They should develop an attitude of benefit toward all beings, and they should not develop an attitude that is harmful to them. They should apprehend all beings with an attitude that is beneficial, and they should not apprehend them with an attitude that is harmful. They should develop an attitude that is free from enmity for all beings, and they should not develop an attitude of enmity. They should develop an attitude toward all beings that is free from harming, and they should not develop an attitude that harms them. [F.348.a] They should apprehend all beings with an attitude that is free from harm, and they should not apprehend them with a harmful attitude. They should develop an attitude that regards all beings as their mother, with an attitude that regards them as their father, with an attitude that regards them as their brother, with an attitude that regards them as their sister, and with an attitude that regards them as their allies and kinsmen. They should offer benedictions and greetings with an attitude that regards all beings as their parents, brothers, sisters, friends, allies, and kinsmen. They themselves should also abstain from killing living creatures, and they should encourage others to abstain from killing living creatures. They should praise abstention from the killing of living creatures. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from the killing of living creatures. {Ki.IV: 136} They themselves should abstain from stealing, and they should encourage others to abstain from stealing. They should praise abstention from stealing. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from stealing. They themselves should abstain from sexual misconduct, and they should encourage others to abstain from sexual misconduct. They should praise abstention from sexual misconduct. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from sexual misconduct. They themselves should abstain from telling lies, slander, harsh words, nonsensical chatter, covetousness, malice, and wrong views, and they should encourage others to abstain from wrong views [and so forth]. They should praise abstention from wrong views [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from wrong views [and so forth]. It is in this way that bodhisattva great beings [F.348.b] who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.97 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should themselves be absorbed in the first meditative concentration, and they should encourage others to acquire the first meditative concentration. They should praise absorption in the first meditative concentration. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others being absorbed in the first meditative concentration. They should themselves be absorbed in the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration, and they should encourage others to acquire the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. They should praise absorption in the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others being absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. It is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.98 “They themselves should be absorbed in loving kindness, and they should encourage others to acquire loving kindness. They should praise loving kindness. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others being absorbed in loving kindness. They themselves should be absorbed in compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity, and they should encourage others to acquire equanimity [and so forth]. They should praise equanimity [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others being absorbed in equanimity [and so forth]. {Ki.IV: 137} They themselves should be absorbed in the formless absorptions, [F.349.a] and they should encourage others to acquire the formless absorptions. They should praise the formless absorptions. They should praise and take empathetic delight in others who acquire the formless absorptions.

38.99 “They themselves should perfect the perfection of generosity, and they should encourage others also to acquire the perfection of generosity. They should praise the perfection of generosity. They should also praise and take empathetic delight in other beings perfecting the perfection of generosity. They themselves should perfect the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and they should encourage others also to acquire the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. They should praise the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. They should also praise and take empathetic delight in other beings perfecting the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. It is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.100 “They themselves should be absorbed in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they should also encourage others to acquire the emptiness of internal phenomena. They should praise the emptiness of internal phenomena. They should also praise and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in the emptiness of internal phenomena. They themselves should be absorbed in [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and they should also encourage others to acquire the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. [F.349.b] They should praise the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. They should also praise and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth].

38.101 “They themselves should cultivate the four applications of mindfulness, and they should also encourage others to acquire the four applications of mindfulness. They should praise the applications of mindfulness. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating the four applications of mindfulness. They themselves should cultivate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, and they should also encourage others to acquire the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. They should praise the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. {Ki.IV:138}

38.102 “They themselves should cultivate the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, and they should also encourage others to acquire the nine serial steps of meditative absorption [and so forth]. They should praise the nine serial steps of meditative absorption [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating nine serial steps of meditative absorption [and so forth].

38.103 “They themselves should cultivate emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, and they should also encourage others to acquire emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They should praise emptiness, signlessness, [F.350.a] and wishlessness. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They themselves should perfect the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, and they should also encourage others to acquire the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They should praise the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings perfecting the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They themselves should perfect the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, and great compassion, and they should also encourage others to acquire great loving kindness, great compassion [and so forth]. They should praise great loving kindness, great compassion [and so forth]. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings perfecting great loving kindness, great compassion [and so forth]. They themselves should perfect the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and they should also encourage others to acquire the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They should praise the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings perfecting the distinct qualities of the buddhas. {Ki.IV: 139}

38.104 “They themselves should be absorbed in the links of dependent origination in their forward and reversed operation, and they should also encourage others to be absorbed in the links of dependent origination in their forward and reversed operation. They should praise absorption in the links of dependent origination. [F.350.b] They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in the links of dependent origination. It is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.105 “They themselves should comprehend suffering; they should abandon the cause [of suffering]; they should actualize the cessation [of suffering]; they should cultivate the path [that leads to the cessation of suffering], and they should also encourage others to comprehend suffering, to abandon the cause [of suffering], to actualize the cessation [of suffering], and to cultivate the path. They should praise the comprehension of suffering, the abandoning of the cause [of suffering], the actualizing of the cessation [of suffering], and the cultivation of the path. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings comprehending suffering, abandon the cause [of suffering], actualize the cessation [of suffering], and cultivate the path.

38.106 “They themselves should develop understanding in order that knowledge of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa might be actualized, and they should also encourage others to acquire knowledge through which the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is actualized. They should praise the knowledge through which the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is actualized. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings actualizing knowledge of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They themselves should develop understanding in order that knowledge of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and the fruit of arhatship might be actualized, but without actualizing the very limit of reality, and they should also encourage others to acquire knowledge through which the fruit of arhatship [and so forth] is actualized. They should praise the knowledge through which the fruit of arhatship [and so forth] is actualized. [F.351.a] They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings actualizing knowledge of the fruit of arhatship [and so forth]. They themselves should develop understanding in order that knowledge of individual enlightenment might be actualized, but so that those who actualize knowledge of individual enlightenment do not actualize the very limit of reality, and they should also encourage others to acquire knowledge through which individual enlightenment is actualized. They should praise the knowledge through which individual enlightenment is actualized. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings actualizing knowledge of individual enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 140}

38.107 “They themselves should enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity, and they should also encourage others to enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. They should praise entry into the maturity of the bodhisattvas. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings entering a bodhisattva’s full maturity. It is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who wish to be emancipated in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.108 “They themselves should bring beings to maturation, and they should also encourage others to bring beings to maturation. They should praise the bringing of beings to maturation. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings bringing beings to maturation. They themselves should refine the buddhafiels, and they should also encourage others to refine the buddhafiels. They should praise the refinement of the buddhafiels. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings refining the buddhafiels. [F.351.b] They themselves should develop the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas, and they should also encourage others to develop the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas. They should praise the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings developing the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas. They themselves should develop the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience, and they should also encourage others to acquire the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. They should praise the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings developing the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. They themselves should abandon all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, and they should also encourage others to abandon all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities. They should praise the abandoning of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings abandoning all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities. It is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who wish to be emancipated in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.109 “They themselves should acquire an excellent lifespan, and they should also encourage others to acquire an excellent lifespan. They should praise an excellent lifespan. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings acquiring an excellent lifespan. {Ki.IV: 141} They themselves should acquire the stability of the Dharma, and they should also encourage others to acquire the stability of the Dharma. [F.352.a] They should praise the stability of the Dharma. They should praise and take empathetic delight in other beings acquiring the stability of the Dharma. Subhūti, it is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who wish to be emancipated in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should dwell without apprehending anything.

38.110 “Bodhisattva great beings should train accordingly in the perfection of wisdom and in skill in means. The physical forms of those who do so will be unobscured. Their feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness will be unobscured. Their sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination will be unobscured. All the perfections, all their aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment will be unobscured. [All the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, will be unobscured. Knowledge of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa will be unobscured. Knowledge of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, knowledge of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and knowledge of arhatship will be unobscured. Knowledge of individual enlightenment will be unobscured. Entry into the maturity of the bodhisattvas will be unobscured. The acts that bring maturity to beings and refine the buddhafiels will be unobscured. The wisdom of all-aspect omniscience will be unobscured. The abandoning of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities will be unobscured. An excellent lifespan will be unobscured, and the stability of the Dharma will be unobscured.

- 38.111 “If you ask why, [F.352.b] Subhūti, it is because those bodhisattva great beings of the past have not grasped physical forms, and they have not grasped feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They have not grasped the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. They have not grasped any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They have not grasped [any of the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They have not grasped [any of the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, it is because those physical forms that have not been grasped are not physical forms. Those feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that have not been grasped are not consciousness [and so forth]. Those sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination that have not been grasped are not the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment that have not been grasped are not the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. [All the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, that have not been grasped are not the qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. [All the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that have not been grasped are not all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].”
- 38.112 When he explained this abiding nature of the bodhisattvas, two thousand bodhisattvas acquired acceptance that phenomena are nonarising.
- 38.113 This completes the thirty-eighth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 39

- 39.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, [F.353.a] what are the attributes of bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible? What are their indications? What are their signs? How should we know that such bodhisattva great beings are irreversible?”
- 39.2 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti, “In this regard, Subhūti, the level of ordinary people, the level of the śrāvakas, the level of the pratyekabuddhas, the level of the bodhisattvas, and the level of the tathāgatas—all these levels [of spiritual attainment] that have been explained—are unchanging in the real nature. They are nonconceptual, nondual, and indivisible. Those [bodhisattva great beings] engage definitively in that real nature, just as it is. They do not conceive of that real nature, and so they engage without conceiving of it. Having engaged in that manner, and having definitively heard about the real nature, just as it is, they transcend such [levels of attainment] and they are not in the slightest consumed by doubt, thinking that the real nature is individual, dual, or neither. They do not prattle incoherently. They speak words that are meaningful, without speaking meaninglessly. They do not look upon what others have and have not done. They pursue excellent speech. {Ki.IV: 142} Subhūti, one should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, those indications, and those signs are irreversible.”
- 39.3 “Blessed Lord, through which attributes, indications, and signs are bodhisattva great beings known to be irreversible?”
- “Subhūti, all phenomena are without attributes, without indications, and without signs!” replied the Blessed One.
- 39.4 “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are without attributes, without indications, and without signs, then from what phenomena have the bodhisattva great beings turned away so that they may be revealed to be irreversible?”

39.5 “Subhūti,” [F.353.b] replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings have turned away from physical forms, when they have turned away from feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, and when they have turned away from the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination, then, Subhūti, you should know that those bodhisattva great beings are irreversible. When bodhisattva great beings have turned away from the perfection of generosity; when they have turned away from the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; when they have turned away from the emptiness of internal phenomena; when they have turned away from [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; when they have turned away from the applications of mindfulness; when they have turned away from the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; when they have turned away from the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; when they have turned away from the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; when they have turned away from the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; when they have turned away from the levels of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas; when they have turned away from knowledge of the path; and when they have turned away from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, then, Subhūti, you should know that those bodhisattva great beings are irreversible. [F.354.a]

39.6 “If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because there is no essential nature of physical forms in which bodhisattva great beings could be established. There is no essential nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness in which bodhisattva great beings could be established. There is no essential nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination in which bodhisattva great beings could be established. There is no essential nature of any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment in which bodhisattva great beings could be established. There is no essential nature of [any of the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, in which bodhisattva great beings could be established. There is no essential nature of [any of the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, in which bodhisattva great beings could be established. {Ki.IV: 143}

39.7 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings are not beholden to virtuous ascetics and brahmins of other [non-Buddhist] persuasions, saying that those virtuous ascetics and brahmins know what should be known, see what should be seen, or conceive of the correct view. That would be impossible! They do not have doubts. They do not overestimate or fall into wrong views concerning their ethical discipline and ascetic practices. They do not conceive of purity [merely] on the basis of auspicious ceremonies and omens. They do not pay homage to strange gods. They do not offer them flowers, garlands, perfume, unguents, powders, clothing, parasols, victory banners, or ribbons, and they do not consider doing so. Subhūti, one should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. [F.354.b]

39.8 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible will not be reborn among denizens of the hells. They will not be reborn in the animal realm. They will not be reborn in the world of Yama. They will not be reborn within the eight unfavorable states with no opportunity [to practice the Dharma]. Nor will they assume the physical form of a woman. Subhūti, one should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

39.9 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible adopt and practice the ways of the ten virtuous actions. They themselves will have abstained from killing living creatures, and they also encourage others to successfully abstain from killing living creatures. They praise abstinence from killing living creatures. They praise and take empathetic delight in others who have abstained from killing living creatures. They themselves will have abstained from stealing, sexual misconduct, telling lies, slander, harsh words, nonsensical chatter, covetousness, malice, and wrong views, and they also encourage others to abstain from wrong views [and so forth]. They praise abstention from wrong views [and so forth]. They praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from wrong views [and so forth]. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

39.10 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible do not apprehend the ways of the ten nonvirtuous actions, even in their dreams, let alone when they are awake. Subhūti, one should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. {Ki.IV: 144} [F.355.a]

- 39.11 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible dwell in the perfection of generosity, and when they dwell in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, at that time they dispense gifts for the sake of all beings, they maintain ethical discipline, they cultivate tolerance, they undertake perseverance, they are absorbed in meditative concentration, and they cultivate wisdom. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.12 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible have mastered, for the purpose of giving the Dharma, the categories of the teachings, which include the discourses, the sayings in prose and verse, the prophetic declarations, the verses, the aphorisms, the contexts, the quotations, the tales of past lives, the most extensive teachings, the narratives, and the established instructions. Consequently, when they dispense the gift of the Dharma, they think, ‘May the wishes of all beings be fulfilled by means of this gift of the Dharma!’ Making common cause with all beings, they dedicate that gift of the Dharma toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.13 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible have no doubt, indecision, or hesitation with regard to the profound attributes.”
- 39.14 “Blessed Lord, [F.355.b] why do bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible have no doubt, indecision, or hesitation with regard to the profound attributes?”
- 39.15 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is because bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible do not observe anything at all with respect to which they might have doubt, indecision, or hesitation. That is to say, they do not observe physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, any of the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, or [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. {Ki.IV: 145}

- 39.16 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible undertake gentle physical actions, gentle verbal actions, and gentle mental actions. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.17 “Moreover, Subhūti, the bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible undertake physical actions imbued with loving kindness, [F.356.a] verbal actions imbued with loving kindness, and mental actions imbued with loving kindness. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.18 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible instinctively do not dwell in the five obscurations, comprising longing for sensual pleasure, harmful intention, dullness and sleep, agitation and regret, and doubt. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.19 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible are in every respect without all latent impulses. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, whether bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible are going or coming, they do not go with a confused mind and they do not come with a confused mind. Whether they are going or coming, they go in accordance with the applications of mindfulness, and they come in accordance with the applications of mindfulness. They set out and return mindfully. They come mindfully. They walk mindfully, stand mindfully, sit mindfully, and lie down mindfully. They do not raise their feet from the ground impulsively, and they do not put their feet on the ground impulsively. They raise their feet from the ground mindfully, they put their feet on the ground mindfully, and they move while looking where they are going. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. {Ki.IV: 146}
- 39.21 “Moreover, Subhūti, [F.356.b] the condition of the robes belonging to bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible is not unkempt. Subhūti, the conduct of bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible is pure. They are clean and without bad odors. They themselves have few ailments, and they are free from dust and stains. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.
- 39.22 “Moreover, Subhūti, the bodies of bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible are entirely and in all respects even without the eighty thousand kinds of minute organisms that are present within the human body, and consume it. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the roots of virtue of bodhisattva great beings surpass all worlds, and are supreme in all worlds. For this reason, the bodies of those bodhisattva great beings are without those eighty thousand kinds of minute organisms.

39.23 “Subhūti, the more those roots of virtue of bodhisattva great beings increase, the more will those bodhisattva great beings assume physical purity and assume verbal and mental purity. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.”

39.24 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how are bodhisattva great beings physically pure? How are they verbally pure and how are they mentally pure?”

39.25 “Subhūti,” replied [F.357.a] the Blessed One, “the more those roots of virtue of bodhisattva great beings increase, the more will their physical, verbal, and mental deformations, and their physical, verbal, and mental crookedness be purified in accordance with those roots of virtue. Insofar as they physically practice the three modes of excellent conduct, verbally practice the four modes of excellent conduct, and mentally practice the three modes of excellent conduct, the body, speech, and mind of those bodhisattva great beings will be purified. Those who possess physical, verbal, and mental purity transcend the level of the śrāvakas and also the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and they do not actualize the very limit of reality. {Ki.IV: 147} Subhūti, you should know this indeed to be the physical, verbal, and mental purity that those bodhisattvas have. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

39.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible are not attracted to profit, veneration, or eulogistic verses. They are not attracted to alms. They are not attracted to the three religious robes [and so forth], but they assume and practice the twelve ascetic virtues. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

39.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, in bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible, thoughts of miserliness do not arise, thoughts of degenerate morality do not arise, thoughts of agitation do not arise, thoughts of indolence do not arise, [F.357.b] thoughts of nonabsorption do not arise, thoughts of stupidity do not arise, and thoughts of envy do not arise. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

39.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible are of steadfast intelligence and of profound intelligence. They respectfully listen to the Dharma from others, and whatever doctrines they hear from others, they establish them all through the perfection of wisdom. All those activities that are mundane, relying on the perfection of wisdom they also bring into accordance with reality. They do not observe anything at all that is not integrated within the realm of phenomena. They observe rather that all these phenomena are integrated with the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, you should know these to be the defining characteristics bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible.

39.29 “Subhūti, if the evil Māra were to conjure up the eight great hells⁴⁶² with their denizens in the presence of bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible, and if he were also to conjure up and reveal in each of these great hells with their denizens many hundreds of bodhisattvas, many thousands of bodhisattvas, many hundreds of thousands of bodhisattvas, many ten millions of bodhisattvas, many billions of bodhisattvas, many trillions of bodhisattvas, and many million trillions of bodhisattvas, being burned and cooked, and experiencing unbearable sufferings, pains, and sensations of heat, {Ki.IV: 148} [F.358.a] and if he were then to say to them, ‘These bodhisattva great beings have been prophesied by the tathāgatas to be irreversible, but they have been reborn here, among these denizens of the great hells. Alas! You too, who have been prophesied by the tathāgatas to be irreversible, are [actually] prophesied to become denizens of the hells. Right now, you should reject this mind that is set on enlightenment and you will not be reborn among the denizens of the hells. Acting in that manner, you will proceed to the exalted realms,’ Subhūti, if the minds of those bodhisattva great beings remain unagitated, and they are free from doubt and hesitation, they should know that they have indeed been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past. Those bodhisattva great beings are certain to progress, and stable in their irreversible element. Subhūti, it would be impossible and inopportune for bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible to be reborn among the denizens of the hells, or among the animal realms, or among the mundane spirits of the world of Yama. That is an impossibility. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

39.30 “Moreover, Subhūti, if the evil Māra, in the guise of a virtuous ascetic, were to arrive in the presence of bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible and say, ‘All that you have heard you should confess, namely, that you yourself should refine the perfection of generosity in this manner; that you yourself should refine the perfection of ethical discipline in this manner; that you yourself should refine the perfection of tolerance in this manner; [F.358.b] that you yourself should refine the perfection of perseverance in this manner; that you yourself should refine the perfection of meditative concentration in this manner; that you yourself should refine the perfection of wisdom in this manner; that you yourself should refine the emptiness of internal phenomena in this manner; that you yourself should refine [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, in this manner; that you yourself should refine the applications of mindfulness in this manner; that you yourself should refine the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path in this manner; that you yourself should refine [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, in this manner; that you yourself should refine [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, in this manner; and that you yourself should attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment in this manner. You should let go of that! You should confess individually your rejoicing in all those roots of virtue of the past, future, and present tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, along with their śrāvakas, starting from the time when they first began to set their mind on enlightenment, until they became established in the Dharma. You should let go of all that! That which you have heard is not the word of the buddhas. It has not been spoken by completely awakened buddhas—it is just poetic fabrication. But that which I am teaching you is the word of the buddhas. It has been spoken by the tathāgatas!’ If [on hearing this] bodhisattva great beings are disturbed [F.359.a] and if they are doubtful and hesitant, you should know that they will not have been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past. Those bodhisattva great beings are not certain to progress, and they are not stable in their irreversible element. {Ki.IV: 149}

- 39.31 “If, on the other hand, these bodhisattvas are not disturbed, and are neither doubtful nor hesitant, but rely on reality and rely on nonconditioning and nonarising, then they are unmoved because they have no confidence in others. They do not depend on others for the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom, and do not depend on others for the [attributes and goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Just as arhats whose contaminants have ceased are unmoved because they have no confidence in others, and are not captivated by the evil Māra due to their actualization of reality, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible cannot be crushed by followers of the vehicle of the śrāvakas or by followers of the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and will not turn back from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If that is so, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings are certain to progress. They are stable in their irreversible element and do not depend on others. Subhūti, if they are not swayed even in their confidence in the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, how could they possibly be swayed by having confidence in followers of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, followers of the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, the evil Māra, rival tīrthikas, or other wandering ascetics! That would be impossible. [F.359.b] If you ask why, it is because they do not observe anything in which they should have confidence. They do not observe any physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; any real nature of physical forms; any real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; or any real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. They do not observe any of the perfections, the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, or any real nature of the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. They do not observe any of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas, or any real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They do not observe any [of the goals], up to and including enlightenment, or any real nature of enlightenment [and so forth]. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. [B51]

- 39.32 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil Māra, approaching bodhisattva great beings in the guise of a monk, might say, ‘This is the conduct associated with cyclic existence, but not the conduct of a bodhisattva! [F.360.a] Alas! Right here you should put an end to suffering!’ {Ki.IV: 150} The evil Māra would then reveal to these bodhisattva great beings an imitation of the path—an imitation of the path that accords with the mundane conduct associated with cyclic existence. Or else he would reveal the contemplation of a skeleton [and so forth], or else he would reveal the first meditative concentration, or [the other meditative concentrations and formless absorptions], up to and including the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Saying, ‘Venerable, through this path and through this earnest application, you will attain the fruit of one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa. This is the path and the earnest application through which you will attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship. Venerable, through this path and through this earnest application, right here you should put an end to suffering! Subsequently you will not experience those sufferings associated with conduct that pertains to cyclic existence! Alas! If you would rather not materialize this physical body [of yours] right here, how could you think of assuming yet another physical body!’

- 39.33 “Subhūti, even though Māra speaks such words, the defining characteristic of bodhisattva great beings is such that their minds are undisturbed and undistracted, and they think in addition, ‘This monk who reveals to me in this manner an imitation of the path is beneficial to me; for through this imitation of the path, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa will not be actualized. The fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship will not be actualized. Individual enlightenment will not be actualized, nor indeed will unsurpassed, complete enlightenment be actualized.’ If that is so, and if they further rejoice, thinking, ‘This monk who expounds attachment to me in this manner is beneficial to me! I should understand these modes of attachment. I should train in all the three vehicles!’ [F.360.b] then the evil Māra, knowing that these bodhisattva great beings are rejoicing, would say, ‘O noble child, do you wish to see the many bodhisattva great beings who have served the lord buddhas, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, with robes, alms, lodging, medications, and [other] resources, and who, in the presence of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, have fulfilled the perfection of generosity, and fulfilled the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom? Or [do you wish to see] those who have venerated lord buddhas numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, asking them and questioning them as to how they should dwell in the vehicle of the bodhisattvas for the sake of this vehicle of the bodhisattvas, while engaging in the perfection of generosity; engaging in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; engaging in the emptiness of internal phenomena; engaging in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; {Ki.IV: 151} engaging in the applications of mindfulness; engaging in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; and engaging in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, [F.361.a] the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience? Even though they have lived in accordance with what the lord buddhas have explained, and have persevered in that manner, such bodhisattva great beings have not attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If even those who have been taught in this way, those who have been instructed in this way, those who have lived in this way, and those who have been trained in this way have not attained all-aspect omniscience, how could you ever possibly attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!"

39.34 "If, even when these bodhisattva great beings are being dissuaded in that manner, their minds are not alienated, frightened, or terrified, and if in addition they rejoice, thinking, 'Whenever this monk who expounds to me the attachment through which the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa will not be actualized, and through which the fruit of being tied to one further rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment will not be actualized, that will be beneficial to me!' then the evil Māra, knowing that the minds of those bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, would conjure up, in that very place, a multitude of monks, and say, 'All of these monks have exclusively embarked on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.361.b] but since they remain in the state of arhatship, how could you ever possibly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!'

39.35 "If, even when this is said, those bodhisattva great beings think, 'This is the evil Māra revealing an imitation of the path!' and while practicing the perfection of wisdom, they do not turn back from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and do not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas—and if, in addition, they think, 'It is impossible and inopportune that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of generosity, who practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and who engage with [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, in that manner will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That would be impossible!'—then, Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. {Ki.IV: 152}

- 39.36 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible, while practicing the perfection of wisdom, would think, ‘If, having trained as the tathāgatas have taught, one engages with it by not parting from that practice and focusing one’s attention on it with the perfections in mind, then there will be no degeneration from the perfection of generosity; and there will be no degeneration from the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, [F.362.a] the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. There will be no degeneration from the emptiness of internal phenomena; there will be no degeneration from [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; and there will be no degeneration from the applications of mindfulness; there will be no degeneration from the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. There will be no degeneration from the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions. There will be no degeneration from the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. There will be no degeneration from [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’
- 39.37 “Moreover, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings think, ‘Those who know the deeds of Māra will not degenerate from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment,’ then, Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.”
- 39.38 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, turning away from what are bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible reckoned to be irreversible?”
- 39.39 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “they turn away from the notion of physical forms. [F.362.b] They turn away from the notion of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. They turn away from the notion of the sense fields and the notion of the sensory elements. They turn away from the notion of desire, the notion of hatred, the notion of delusion, and the notion of the [sixty-two] aspects of mistaken view. They turn away from the notion of the perfections, the notion of the aspects of emptiness, the notion of the applications of mindfulness, and the notions of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, {Ki.IV: 153} the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They turn away from the notion of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They turn away from the notion of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They turn away from the notion of the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They turn away from the notion of [the goals], up to and including complete enlightenment. They turn away from the notion of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. They turn away from the notion of bodhisattvas and buddhas. If you ask why, it is because bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible have entered upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas in that all phenomena are empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. They do not apprehend anything at all, even to the extent of an indivisible atomic particle, and because they are without apprehending, they do not condition anything. Because they do not condition anything, they do not produce anything. Bodhisattva great beings are said to have accepted that phenomena are nonarising. Subhūti, [F.363.a] you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.”

39.40 This completes the thirty-ninth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 40: IRREVERSIBILITY

40.1 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil Māra might approach bodhisattva great beings and dissuade them, saying, ‘This all-aspect omniscience is similar to space, of the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. These phenomena are also similar to space, of the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. With regard to phenomena that are similar to space, of the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, there is nothing apprehensible that would attain consummate buddhahood, by which consummate buddhahood would be attained, and in which consummate buddhahood would be attained. Since all these phenomena are similar to space, of the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, you will be disappointed and it would be futile to think that you will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. This has been revealed by Māra, not explained by the completely awakened buddhas! Noble child, you should reject these attentions! Do not endure hardships for long! Do not practice without benefit! You will suffer and be distressed!’

40.2 “If this is said, noble sons or noble daughters, on hearing those words, should reflect, ‘Those [words] that would avert me from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment are the work of Māra. Although all phenomena are indeed similar to space, of the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, [F.363.b] they are not known, seen, or comprehended as such by beings. Therefore, I should don the armor that is similar to space, of the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, attain consummate buddhahood in all-aspect omniscience, and reveal to all beings the Dharma of emancipation [from cyclic existence]. I should establish beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. I should establish them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, {Ki.IV: 154} in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and in arhatship and individual enlightenment. I should establish them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.'

40.3 "In this regard, bodhisattva great beings, from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, should be steadfast when they listen to such things. Their minds should not be distracted. Their minds should not be carried away. If those whose minds are steadfast, undistracted, and not carried away practice the six perfections, they will enter upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas."

40.4 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, "Blessed Lord, can irreversible bodhisattva great beings be called reversible, or can reversible bodhisattvas be called irreversible?"

"Subhūti, irreversible bodhisattvas may be called reversible, and reversible bodhisattvas may be called irreversible," replied the Blessed One.

40.5 "Blessed Lord, how may irreversible bodhisattvas be called reversible, and how may reversible bodhisattvas be called irreversible?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, [F.364.a] "bodhisattva great beings who have turned away from the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas are reversible bodhisattvas [in that they turn away from those levels], but they may be called irreversible bodhisattvas. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who have not turned away from the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas are irreversible bodhisattvas [in that they do not turn away from them], but they may be called reversible. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings are defined as irreversible due to these attributes, indications, and signs. Bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs cannot be turned away from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by the evil Māra.

40.6 "Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible become absorbed at will in the first meditative concentration, and they become absorbed in the second, third, and fourth meditative concentrations. They become absorbed in [the formless absorptions], up to and including cessation [of perceptions and feelings]. {Ki.IV: 155}

40.7 "Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible become absorbed at will in the four applications of mindfulness, and they become absorbed in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They become absorbed in the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They actualize the five extrasensory powers. Through these four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and four formless absorptions, they become acquainted with the absorption of cessation. They investigate the applications of mindfulness,

[F.364.b] and they investigate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They are then reabsorbed in the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, but they do not acquire the fruits of meditative concentration. They do not acquire the fruits of the immeasurable attitudes or the formless absorptions. They do not acquire the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They do not acquire the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship. They do not attain enlightenment. At will, they may acquire the bodily forms that they wish, and through those bodily forms, they act for the benefit of beings. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess these attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

40.8 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible are endowed with attention to enlightenment. They are not separated from enlightened mind, and they do not attach importance to physical forms. They do not attach importance to signs. They do not attach importance to the physical body. They do not attach importance to generosity. They do not attach importance to ethical discipline. They do not attach importance to tolerance. They do not attach importance to perseverance. They do not attach importance to meditative concentration. They do not attach importance to wisdom. They do not attach importance to the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not attach importance to [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not attach importance to the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They do not attach importance to the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, [F.365.a] the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers. They do not attach importance to the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not attach importance to the ten powers of the tathāgatas. They do not attach importance to the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not attach importance to [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They do not attach importance to the buddhafiels that are to be refined. They do not attach importance to the beings who are to be brought to maturity. They do not attach importance to beholding the buddhas, and they do not attach importance to cultivating the roots of virtue. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because all phenomena are empty of intrinsic defining characteristics and therefore those bodhisattva great beings do not observe anything to which, through which, or with respect to which they should cultivate the attachment of importance. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because all phenomena are similar to space, with the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics.

40.9 “Subhūti, irreversible bodhisattva great beings who have that as the focus of their attention come and go in accordance with the four norms of behavior,⁴⁶³ but they do not come with a bewildered mind, they do not go with a bewildered mind, they do not stand with a bewildered mind, they do not walk with a bewildered mind, {Ki.IV: 156} they do not sit with a bewildered mind, and they do not lie down with a bewildered mind. They come mindfully, they go mindfully, they walk mindfully, they stand mindfully, they sit mindfully, and they lie down mindfully. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are said to be irreversible.

40.10 “Moreover, Subhūti, [F.365.b] even if bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible dwell as householders, through skill in means they acquire the five desirable objects of the senses in order to bring beings to maturity. They dispense gifts to beings. That is to say, they dispense food to those who need food; drink to those who need drink; vehicles to those who need vehicles; clothing to those who need clothing; bedding to those who need bedding; flowers to those who need flowers; garlands to those who need garlands; unguents to those who need unguents; dwellings to those who need dwellings; wealth, grain, gems, pearls, beryl, conch, quartz, coral, gold, and silver to those in need of wealth, grain, gems, pearls, beryl, conch, quartz, coral, gold, and silver, and they dispense other provisions and resources to those in need of other things. They themselves practice the perfection of generosity and they also encourage others to acquire the perfection of generosity. They praise the perfection of generosity and they also praise and take empathetic delight in others who practice the perfection of generosity. They themselves practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and they also encourage others to acquire the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]. They praise the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] and they also praise and take empathetic delight in others who practice the perfection of wisdom [and so forth].

40.11 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible dwell as householders, they fill Jambudvīpa with diverse precious things and offer these as gifts. They fill the world system of the four continents, the world system of the chiliocosm, the world system of the dichiliocosm, [F.366.a] and the world system of the great trichiliocosm with diverse precious things, and offer these as gifts. Yet they do not indulge in those sensual pleasures, and they always practice chastity, without interruption. They generate nothing despicable that would cause others to dislike them. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are said to be irreversible.

40.12 “Moreover, Subhūti, the yakṣa Vajrapāṇi will always follow without interruption behind irreversible bodhisattva great beings in order to guard them, thinking that these bodhisattva great beings will soon attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and that even after they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, he will always follow them without interruption. To the extent that those in the enlightened family of Vajrapāṇi⁴⁶⁴ will always follow them without interruption, to that extent they can never be harmed by humans or nonhumans. In conformity with the Dharma, they can never be overcome by any god, demon, Brahmā, or anyone else in the world. {Ki.IV: 157} Until they have attained manifest buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, their minds will not be distracted from attention to enlightenment. The faculties of those bodhisattva great beings, comprising the faculty of the eyes, the faculty of the ears, the faculty of the nose, the faculty of the tongue, the faculty of the body, the mental faculty, the faculty of faith, the faculty of perseverance, the faculty of mindfulness, the faculty of meditative stability, and the faculty of wisdom, will not be deficient. They will be saintly persons [F.366.b] and they will not be inferior persons.”

40.13 “Blessed Lord, to what extent will bodhisattva great beings be saintly persons and not be inferior persons?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings are never distracted from the mind of enlightenment, those bodhisattva great beings will be saintly persons and not inferior persons. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are said to be irreversible.

40.14 “Moreover, Subhūti, those irreversible bodhisattva great beings have enlightenment as the focus of their attention. They in no way whatsoever concoct potions—any overpowering spells or words that attract women—nor do they incite anyone to do so. That is to say, they do not indulge in any hint of harmful attraction. They do not make miraculous predictions to any women or men. They do not make miraculous predictions, claiming, ‘You will have a son or daughter who belongs to the class of gods or divine princes!’ or ‘You will have a long life!’ If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because bodhisattva great beings do not observe any signs in phenomena that are empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. Since they do not observe any such signs, their livelihood is perfectly pure. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are said to be irreversible.

40.15 “Moreover, Subhūti, I shall [now] disclose the attributes, indications, and signs through which irreversible bodhisattva great beings are known to be irreversible. [F.367.a] Listen well and pay attention to them! I will explain them!”

40.16 “Please do so, Blessed Lord!” he replied. The venerable Subhūti then listened to the Blessed One, and the Blessed One spoke as follows:

40.17 “In this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not lack the modes of attention to enlightenment. They are not preoccupied with the aggregates, {Ki.IV: 158} nor do they preoccupy themselves with the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because those bodhisattva great beings focus their attention completely on the emptiness of the aggregates, the emptiness of the sense fields, the emptiness of the sensory elements, and the emptiness of the links of dependent origination. They are not preoccupied with social distractions. If you ask why, it is because those bodhisattva great beings focus their attention completely on the emptiness of beings. They are not preoccupied with talk of kings. If you ask why, it is because, abiding in the emptiness of inherent existence, they do not observe anything at all as superior or inferior. They are not preoccupied with talk of robbers. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are empty of intrinsic defining characteristics and so they do not observe anything at all that could be acquired or stolen. They are not preoccupied with talk of battles. If you ask why, it is because, excellently abiding in the emptiness of inherent existence, they do not observe anything at all in terms of minorities and majorities. They are not preoccupied with talk of warfare. [F.367.b] If you ask why, it is because, abiding in the real nature of all phenomena, they do not observe affection or hatred. They are not preoccupied with the talk of towns. If you ask why, it is because, abiding in the emptiness of all phenomena, they do not observe anything at all that is to be gathered or not gathered. They are not preoccupied with the talk of cities. If you ask why, it is because, abiding in the emptiness of space, they do not observe anything at all that is to be grasped or not grasped. They are not preoccupied with the talk of market towns. If you ask why, it is because, abiding in the very limit of reality, they do not observe anything at all that is to be enhanced or diminished. They are not preoccupied with talk about the self, and they are not preoccupied with talk about sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, or viewers. On the contrary, it is talk about the perfection of wisdom that they are preoccupied with, and they never part from focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind.

40.18 “Practicing the perfection of generosity, they are not preoccupied with miserliness. Practicing the perfection of ethical discipline, they are not preoccupied with degenerate morality. Practicing the perfection of tolerance, they are not preoccupied with agitation. Practicing the perfection of perseverance, they are not preoccupied with indolence. Practicing the perfection of meditative concentration, [F.368.a] they are not preoccupied with distractions. Practicing the perfection of wisdom, they are not preoccupied with stupidity. Conducting themselves in the emptiness of all phenomena, they wish for the Dharma and do not not wish for the Dharma. Conducting themselves in the realm of phenomena, they do not praise the diversity of phenomena. {Ki.IV: 159}

40.19 “Thinking to have the lord buddhas and bodhisattva great beings as spiritual mentors, they even encourage all noble sons, noble daughters, and followers of the vehicles of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas; they establish discipline and secure them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. In order to please and behold the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, they are consequently reborn in those world systems where they dwell and are alive at present. That is to say, they wish to be reborn there and accordingly they conduct themselves focusing their attention day and night on the buddhas. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because those irreversible bodhisattva great beings have given rise to that focus of their attention mostly with the realm of desire in mind, and because they abide in the ways of the ten virtuous actions, that they are reborn in those buddhafiels. After they have cultivated the first meditative concentration, after they have cultivated the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration and the fourth meditative concentration, and after they have cultivated [the formless absorptions], up to and including absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, they are reborn in those places where the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are manifest and alive at present, teaching the Dharma. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are said to be irreversible.

40.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, irreversible great bodhisattva [F.368.b] beings who have practiced the perfection of wisdom, who dwell in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and who dwell in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; who dwell in the applications of mindfulness and dwell in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; who dwell in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; who dwell in the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and who dwell in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas do not wonder whether they are irreversible or reversible. They do not hesitate, and they are without doubt regarding their own level. If you ask why, it is because they do not observe anything at all that is reversible or irreversible, even to the extent of the tiniest particle.

40.21 “Subhūti, just as persons entering the stream to nirvāṇa and abiding on the level of one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa have no doubt and no hesitation regarding their own level; just as those abiding on the level of one who is destined for only one more rebirth, abiding on the level of one who is no longer subject to rebirth, and abiding on the level of arhatship have no doubt and no hesitation regarding their own level; just as pratyekabuddhas abiding on the level of the pratyekabuddhas have no doubt and no hesitation regarding their own level; just as bodhisattvas abiding on the level of the bodhisattvas have no doubt and no hesitation regarding their own level; [F.369.a] and just as completely awakened buddhas abiding on the level of the completely awakened buddhas have no doubt and no hesitation regarding their own level, in the same way, Subhūti, these bodhisattva great beings too have no doubt and no hesitation regarding their own level. {Ki.IV: 160} Therefore, abiding on that level at which progress has become irreversible, they also refine the buddhafiels and they bring beings to maturity. Knowing, too, the deeds of Māra that have arisen and occurred, they do not fall under the influence of Māra’s deeds. Rather, they overwhelm and wear them down.

40.22 “Subhūti, just as a man who has committed an inexpressible crime will never be separated from the thoughts associated with that inexpressible crime, even until death, and the thoughts of that inexpressible crime will pursue him, such that he cannot banish the thoughts of that inexpressible crime by any means whatsoever, and his obsessive thoughts will pursue him even until death, in the same way, Subhūti, the irreversible thoughts of irreversible bodhisattva great beings are indeed established on the level at which progress has become irreversible. Those thoughts do not vacillate and do not waver. The world with its gods, humans, and asuras cannot turn them back. If you ask why, it is because their thoughts have transcended the world with its gods, humans, and asuras, and entered into authentic maturity. Abiding on their own level, they have reached supreme perfection in the extrasensory powers, and so they refine the buddhafiels and also bring beings to maturity. They travel from buddhafiels to buddhafiels in order to behold, pay homage to, and listen to the Dharma from the lord buddhas. [F.369.b] Throughout those buddhafiels they cultivate the roots of virtue in the presence of the lord buddhas, and they question, counter-question, and venerate those lord buddhas.

40.23 “Subhūti, since those bodhisattva great beings dwell in that manner, they comprehend the deeds of Māra that have arisen and occurred. They do not go forth under the influence of those deeds of Māra that have arisen and occurred. They can even integrate those deeds of Māra in the very limit of reality through their skill in means. They never have doubt, indecision, or hesitation regarding their own level. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because they have no doubt regarding the very limit of reality, and so they do not consider the very limit of reality as singular or dual. Knowing this, even after they have passed away, they will not generate thoughts on the levels of the śrāvakas or the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because bodhisattva great beings, with regard to all phenomena, which are empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, do not observe anything at all that is subject to arising, cessation, affliction, or purification.

40.24 “Subhūti, when those bodhisattva great beings have passed away, they will not think, ‘I will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ Certainly they will think, ‘I shall attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. {Ki.IV: 161}

40.25 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who dwell in that manner on their own level cannot be overcome on their own level. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because irreversible bodhisattva great beings [F.370.a] who dwell accordingly are endowed with wisdom that cannot be captivated. Subhūti, if the evil Māra were to approach irreversible bodhisattva great beings in the guise of the buddhas, he might say, ‘In this [lifetime], you should attain arhatship! You are not prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. You have not acquired the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising, whereby the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas would prophesy that you will attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. You do not possess the attributes, the indications, or the signs endowed with which bodhisattva great beings are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’

40.26 “Subhūti, if, even on hearing these words, bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, not intimidated, not alienated, and not terrified, then, Subhūti, these bodhisattva great beings are prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because these bodhisattva great beings should know that they themselves possess the attributes endowed with which they are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

40.27 “Subhūti, even if the evil Māra, or someone under the influence of Māra, were to approach bodhisattva great beings in the guise of a buddha and prophesy that they will attain the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, [F.370.b] these bodhisattva great beings would think, ‘The tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not encourage bodhisattva great beings to attain the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Alas! This is the evil Māra, or someone under the influence of the evil Māra, who has approached me in the guise of a buddha!’ And, Subhūti, if the evil Māra were to approach bodhisattva great beings in the guise of a buddha while they are reciting and disseminating the most extensive sūtras and say, ‘Those sūtras that you are practicing have been taught by Māra. They have not been taught by the lord buddhas, the śrāvakas, or the pratyekabuddhas!’ then when this was said, Subhūti, these bodhisattva great beings would know, ‘Alas! This is the evil Māra, or someone under the influence of Māra, who would separate me from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ If this is so, Subhūti, these bodhisattva great beings have been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 162} Those bodhisattva great beings should know that they dwell on the level at which progress has become irreversible. If you ask why, it is because they possess the attributes, indications, and signs of irreversible bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible. [F.371.a]

40.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, when irreversible bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they will relinquish even themselves, and they will sacrifice their own lives, for the sake of acquiring the Dharma, but they do not relinquish the doctrine. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings persevere in that manner in order to acquire the Dharma. They persevere in that manner so as to acquire the Dharma of the lord buddhas of the past, the future, and the present, and they do not relinquish the Dharma. If you ask why, it is because they think, ‘I will worship the lord buddhas of the past, the future, and the present, since they have acquired the Dharma. I also will acquire their Dharma.’ If you ask for the sake of which doctrine bodhisattva great beings relinquish themselves and sacrifice their lives, in this regard, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas teach the doctrine that all phenomena are empty. Some foolish persons may contradict this and repudiate it, saying, ‘This is not the Dharma. This is not the Vinaya. This is not the taught by the Teacher.’ However, Subhūti, even though bodhisattva great beings will relinquish themselves and sacrifice their lives for the sake of this Dharma, they will not relinquish that. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should train in this manner, thinking, ‘I too will be reckoned among the tathāgatas who will emerge in the future. I too will be prophesied to attain that. For the sake of this doctrine, I will relinquish myself! I will even sacrifice my life, [F.371.b] but that which I will not relinquish is the doctrine!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, considering this objective, will relinquish even themselves and sacrifice their lives for the sake of acquiring the Dharma. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.

40.29 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are irreversible do not harbor doubt or hesitation when the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are teaching the Dharma. They do not have even a single moment of indecision with regard to that doctrine. They grasp all those teachings of the lord buddhas, and having grasped them, they do not squander them. If you ask why, it is because they have acquired the dhāraṇīs that enhance retention.”

40.30 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, by acquiring which dhāraṇīs do bodhisattva great beings not squander the sūtras spoken by the Tathāgata?” {Ki.IV: 163}

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “by acquiring the dhāraṇī of the inexhaustible cornucopia, bodhisattva great beings will not squander the sūtras spoken by the Tathāgata. By acquiring the oceanic seal [absorbing all phenomena], the dhāraṇī of the lotus array, and the dhāraṇī of acquisition, bodhisattva great beings will not squander the sūtras spoken by the Tathāgata.”⁴⁶⁵

40.31 “Blessed Lord, it is the case that one should not squander [the sūtras] spoken only by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. But does this not also refer to those that are explained by the śrāvakas, does it not refer to those explained by the gods, [F.372.a] does it not refer to those explained by the nāgas, does it not refer to those explained by the yakṣas, does it not refer to those explained by the gandharvas, does it not refer to those explained by the asuras, does it not refer to those explained by garuḍas, and does it not refer to those explained by mahoragas?”

40.32 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “these bodhisattva great beings have no doubt and no hesitation regarding all languages, symbols, and sounds. If you ask why, it is because they have acquired the dhāraṇīs that enhance retention. Subhūti, you should know that bodhisattva great beings who possess those attributes, indications, and signs are irreversible.”

40.33 This completes the fortieth chapter, “Irreversibility,” from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 41

- 41.1 The venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, irreversible bodhisattva great beings are endowed with great attributes. Blessed Lord, irreversible bodhisattva great beings are endowed with incalculable and inestimable attributes. Blessed Lord, irreversible bodhisattva great beings are endowed with unshakeable attributes.”
- 41.2 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, irreversible bodhisattva great beings are endowed with great attributes. Subhūti, irreversible bodhisattva great beings are endowed with incalculable and inestimable attributes. Subhūti, irreversible bodhisattva great beings are endowed with unshakeable attributes. [F.372.b] If you ask why, it is because they have acquired the infinite and limitless wisdom that is not shared in common with any śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas. Abiding in this wisdom, irreversible bodhisattva great beings have actualized the kinds of exact knowledge—the kinds of exact knowledge in consequence of which they cannot succumb to any response, even when questioned by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras.”
- 41.3 Subhūti then requested, “Blessed Lord, since the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have the power to reveal, over eons numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, the attributes, indications, and signs on account of which irreversible bodhisattva great beings are called irreversible bodhisattva great beings, Blessed Lord, please reveal the profound states in which bodhisattva great beings, when practicing the six perfections, complete the four applications of mindfulness; in which they complete the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, {Ki.IV: 164} the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; in which they complete the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; in which they complete the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; in which they complete the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; [F.373.a] in which they complete the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and in which they complete [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

41.4 “Excellent, Subhūti! Excellent!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, it is excellent that you are thinking to ask the Tathāgata about those profound states, for the sake of irreversible bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, this term profound is a designation of emptiness. This is a designation of signlessness, wishlessness, nonconditioning, nonarising, nonattachment, noncessation, nirvāṇa, quiescence, real nature, the very limit of reality, and the realm of phenomena. Subhūti, these designations of nirvāṇa are said to be profound states.”

41.5 “Is it a designation of nirvāṇa but not of all phenomena?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the term profound is indeed a designation of all phenomena. If you ask why, Subhūti, physical forms are profound. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are profound. Subhūti, the eyes are profound. The ears, nose, tongue, body, and [F.373.b] mental faculty are profound. Subhūti, sights are profound. Sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena are profound. Subhūti, visual consciousness is profound. Visually compounded sensory contact and feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact are profound. Subhūti, auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, and mental consciousness are profound. Mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], are profound. Subhūti, the earth element is profound. The water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element are profound. Subhūti, ignorance, formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, and aging and death are profound. Subhūti, all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are profound. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, {Ki.IV:165} the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are profound. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are profound. Subhūti, [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are profound. Enlightenment is profound.

41.6 “Subhūti, if you ask how physical forms are profound; how feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are profound; how the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are profound; how all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are profound; how [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are profound; how [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are profound; and how enlightenment is profound, physical forms are as profound as the real nature of physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are as profound as the real nature of consciousness [and so forth]. The sense fields, [F.374.a] sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are as profound as the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are as profound as the real nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are as profound as the real nature of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are as profound as the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are as profound as the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. Enlightenment is as profound as the real nature of enlightenment.”

41.7 “Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of physical forms? Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination? Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment? Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience? Blessed Lord, how is the real nature of enlightenment?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “in the real nature of physical forms there are indeed no physical forms, [F.374.b] nor is there any real nature other than physical forms—such is the real nature of physical forms. Subhūti, in the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness there is indeed no consciousness [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than consciousness [and so forth]—such is the real nature of consciousness [and so forth]. Subhūti, in the real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination there are indeed no links of dependent origination [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than the links of dependent origination [and so forth]—such is the real nature of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. Subhūti, in the real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment there are indeed no factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]—such is the real nature of the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. In the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions, there are indeed no formless absorptions [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than the formless absorptions [and so forth]—such is the real nature of the formless absorptions [and so forth]. In the real nature of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, there is indeed no emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness [and so forth]—such is the real nature of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness [and so forth]. In the real nature of the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, there are indeed no distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]— [F.375.a] such is the real nature of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. Subhūti, in the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, there is indeed no all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], nor is there any real nature other than all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]—such is the real nature of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. Subhūti, in the real nature of enlightenment, there is indeed no enlightenment, nor is there any real nature other than enlightenment—such is the real nature of enlightenment.” {Ki.IV: 166}

41.9 “Blessed Lord, how wonderful it is that by such a subtle method irreversible bodhisattva great beings have indeed turned away from physical forms, and have also pointed toward nirvāṇa! They have indeed turned away from feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, and have also pointed toward nirvāṇa! They have indeed turned away from the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination, and have also pointed toward nirvāṇa! They have indeed turned away from all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment, and have also pointed toward nirvāṇa! They have indeed turned away from [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the distinct qualities of the buddhas, and have also pointed toward nirvāṇa! They have indeed turned away from all grasping for phenomena that are mundane, supramundane, common, uncommon, contaminated, and uncontaminated, and have also pointed toward nirvāṇa!”

41.10 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should themselves dwell in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in the perfection of wisdom. If, with regard to these profound states associated with the perfection of wisdom, they think, evaluate, and reflect that they themselves should train in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in the perfection of wisdom, then, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who practice, reflect, investigate, persevere, and make efforts in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in the perfection of wisdom, [F.375.b] and who strive in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in the perfection of wisdom, will acquire through a single setting of the mind on enlightenment roots of virtuous action that are incalculable, immeasurable, and inestimable. If they can spurn cyclic existence for immeasurable eons, it goes without saying that they will practice the perfection of wisdom without adulteration and maintain the directing of their mind toward enlightenment.

41.11 “Subhūti, just as if a man with thoughts that are preoccupied with desire might have arranged to meet up with an attractive, beautiful, and good-looking woman, but that woman is restrained by another and unable to leave the house, with what, do you think, Subhūti, would the thoughts of that man be concerned?”

41.12 “Blessed Lord, the thoughts of that man would be concerned with the woman. He would think, ‘My woman is such and such! She should come and then I would stay with her and sport with her!’ ”

41.13 “Subhūti, how many such thoughts will that man have over a day or night?” asked the Blessed One.

 “There will be many! Sugata, there will be many! The thoughts of that man over a day or night will be extremely many.” {Ki.IV: 167}

- 41.14 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “as many as the thoughts that man has over a day or night, for so many eons will bodhisattva great beings spurn cyclic existence and turn their backs on it. If bodhisattva great beings train, investigate, and reflect in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, and if they spurn by all means those faults by which they would turn away from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and persevere in that manner, then, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who strive in this endeavor, abiding in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, [F.376.a] will in a single day acquire roots of virtuous action such that those accrued by having filled world systems numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā [with gifts] could not come anywhere near even a hundredth part of their residue of the roots of virtuous action, and could not come anywhere near even a thousandth part, a hundred thousandth part, or any fraction, number, comparison, or material part.
- 41.15 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they offer gifts to the Three Precious Jewels—namely to the precious jewel of the Buddha, the precious jewel of the Dharma, and the precious jewel of the Saṅgha—over eons as numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, do you think, Subhūti, that the merits of those bodhisattva great beings would on that basis increase manifold?”
- 41.16 “Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold! They would be immeasurable, inestimable, inconceivable, and incomparable!”
- 41.17 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “if there are bodhisattva great beings who persevere in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, their merits will increase manifold even more than the former. If you ask why, the way of bodhisattva great beings is the way by which consummate buddhahood is attained in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [B52]
- 41.18 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings who lack the perfection of wisdom offer donations, over eons equal in number to the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, to those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, and when they offer donations to those who are destined for only one more rebirth, to those who are no longer subject to rebirth, to arhats and pratyekabuddhas, and to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, do you think, Subhūti, [F.376.b] that the merits of those bodhisattva great beings would increase manifold on that basis?” {Ki.IV: 168}
- “Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold!”

- 41.19 The Blessed One continued, “When any noble son or noble daughter perseveres in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, their merits will increase manifold even more than the former. If you ask why, it is because the bodhisattva great beings who practice this perfection of wisdom transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, and after entering upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.
- 41.20 “Subhūti, when certain bodhisattva great beings, lacking the perfection of wisdom, and living for eons equal in number to the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, offer generosity, maintain ethical discipline, practice tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivate wisdom, do you think that their merits would increase manifold on that basis?”
- “Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold!”
- 41.21 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when any noble son or noble daughter, abiding in this perfection of wisdom, for just a few days offers generosity, maintains ethical discipline, practices tolerance, cultivates perseverance, becomes absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivates wisdom, their merits will increase manifold even more than the former. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because this perfection of wisdom is the mother of bodhisattva great beings. That is to say, this perfection of wisdom generates bodhisattva great beings. Abiding in this perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings bring all phenomena to completion. [F.377.a]
- 41.22 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings, lacking the perfection of wisdom, and remaining for eons equal in number to the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, offer the gift of the Dharma, do you think that the merits of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold on that basis?”
- “Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold!”
- 41.23 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when any noble son or noble daughter, abiding in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this perfection of wisdom, for just a few days offers the gift of the Dharma, their merits will increase manifold even more on that basis than the former. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because bodhisattva great beings who lack the perfection of wisdom also lack all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.IV: 169} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who do not lack the perfection of wisdom do not lack all-aspect omniscience.
- 41.24 “So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should not lack the perfection of wisdom.

41.25 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings, who lack the perfection of wisdom, abiding for eons equal in number to the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, persevere with the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, and the meditative stabilities of emptiness, [F.377.b] signlessness, and wishlessness, do you think, Subhūti, that the merits of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifoldly on that basis?”

 “Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold!”

41.26 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when any noble son or noble daughter, abiding in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, for just a few days perseveres with the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, and the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, their merits will increase manifold even more on that basis than the former. If you ask why, there is no circumstance and no occasion in which bodhisattva great beings who do not lack the perfection of wisdom will turn away from all-aspect omniscience. That would be impossible! On the other hand, Subhūti, it is possible that bodhisattva great beings who lack the perfection of wisdom might turn away from all-aspect omniscience. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should not lack the perfection of wisdom. {Ki.IV: 170}

41.27 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings who lack the perfection of wisdom, abiding over eons equal in number to the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, dedicate material gifts, the gift of the Dharma, and the modes of attention associated with meditative seclusion to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.378.a] do you think that the respective merits of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold on that basis?”

 “Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold!”

41.28 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when any noble son or noble daughter, abiding in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, for just a few days dedicates those material gifts, that gift of the Dharma, and those modes of attention associated with meditative seclusion to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, then the merits of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold more than the former. If you ask why, it is because this dedication of the perfection of wisdom is supreme among dedications. The dedication that lacks the perfection of wisdom is no dedication. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should be skilled in the dedication of the perfection of wisdom.

41.29 “Subhūti, when certain noble sons or noble daughters who lack the perfection of wisdom, abiding over eons equal in number to the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, rejoice in all the roots of virtuous action of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, along with their monastic communities of śrāvakas, and dedicate these [roots] toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, do you think that the merits of those noble sons or noble daughters would increase manifold on this basis?”

“Blessed Lord, they would be manifold! Sugata, they would be manifold!”

41.30 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when any noble son or noble daughter, abiding in accordance with the teachings as they are revealed in this profound perfection of wisdom, dedicates the roots of virtuous action of just a few days toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, the merit of that noble son or noble daughter would increase manifold more than those. [F.378.b] If you ask why, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom precedes all dedications. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should be skilled in the dedication of the perfection of wisdom.”

41.31 “Blessed Lord, since the Blessed One has said that phenomena that are not subject to conditioning are imaginary, how {Ki.IV:171} could the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters increase manifold, more than the former? Blessed Lord, that which is not subject to conditioning cannot generate the authentic view or even enter into the maturity [of the bodhisattvas]! Nor can it attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, or attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship [and so forth], up to and including the attainment of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

41.32 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “That which is not subject to conditioning cannot generate the authentic view or even enter into the maturity [of the bodhisattvas]! Nor can it attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, or attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship [and so forth], up to and including the attainment of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. In this case, Subhūti, those gifts of bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom are not subject to conditioning—they are declared to be just empty, they are declared to be just hollow, they are declared to be just void, and they are declared to be essenceless. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because bodhisattva great beings have thoroughly trained in the emptiness of internal phenomena. They have thoroughly trained in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Subhūti, these bodhisattva great beings dwell in those aspects of emptiness. [F.379.a] Insofar as they discern phenomena that are not subject to conditioning, bodhisattva great beings will not lack the perfection of wisdom. Insofar as bodhisattva great beings do not lack the perfection of wisdom, their incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable merits will increase.”

41.33 “Blessed Lord, what are the distinctions and what are the differences between the incalculable, the inestimable, and the immeasurable?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the term incalculable suggests that the number of conditioned elements and unconditioned elements cannot be approximated. Subhūti, the term inestimable suggests that the extent of past, future, and present phenomena cannot be apprehended. Subhūti, the term immeasurable suggests that which cannot be evaluated.”

41.34 “Blessed Lord, is there a reason why physical forms are incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable, and why feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are also incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable?” {Ki.IV:172}

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “there is indeed a reason why physical forms are incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable, and why feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are also incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable.”

41.35 “Blessed Lord, why then are physical forms incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable? Why are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness also incalculable, inestimable and immeasurable?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “insofar as physical forms are empty, they are incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable. Insofar as feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty, they are also incalculable, inestimable, and immeasurable.” [F.379.b]

41.36 “Blessed Lord, is it only physical forms that are empty, and is it only feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that are empty, or are all phenomena not empty?”

41.37 “Subhūti, do you think that I have not explained all phenomena to be empty?” replied the Blessed One.

“Blessed Lord, the Tathāgata has taught that all phenomena are empty. That which is just empty is inexhaustible. Thus it is also incalculable, it is also inestimable, and it is also immeasurable. Blessed Lord, no number is apprehended, no estimate is apprehended, and no measure is apprehended. So it is, Blessed Lord, that no difference between these phenomena is apprehended, whether in meaning or in enunciation.”

41.38 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “No difference between these phenomena is apprehended, whether in meaning or in enunciation. Subhūti, the terms inexhaustible, immeasurable, empty, signless, wishless, unconditioned, nonarising, unattached, nonceasing, and nirvāṇa are expressions used by the Tathāgata that issue from their inexpressibility. It is explained that these terms, from inexhaustible to nirvāṇa, make manifest the teaching of the tathāgatas.”

41.39 “Blessed Lord, how wonderful it is that the reality of all phenomena has been revealed by the tathāgatas, although this reality is inexpressible! As I understand the meaning of the teachings given by the Blessed One, all phenomena, Blessed Lord, are inexpressible.” {Ki.IV: 173} [F.380.a]

41.40 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, all phenomena are inexpressible. Subhūti, the inexpressibility of all phenomena is emptiness. In emptiness, nothing at all is expressed, and emptiness cannot be expressed.”

41.41 “Blessed Lord, can an object that is inexpressible increase or decrease?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. “An object that is inexpressible neither increases nor decreases.”

41.42 “Blessed Lord, if an object that is inexpressible neither increases nor decreases, then, Blessed Lord, the perfection of generosity would neither increase nor decrease. The perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom would neither increase nor decrease. The four applications of mindfulness would neither increase nor decrease. The correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path would neither increase nor decrease. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, and the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness would neither increase nor decrease. The extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways would neither increase nor decrease. [F.380.b] The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas would neither increase nor decrease. Blessed Lord, if that were the case, the six perfections would be nonexistent. [The attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, would be nonexistent. If all phenomena were nonexistent, all-aspect omniscience would also be nonexistent. If all-aspect omniscience were nonexistent, who would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

41.43 "Subhūti, it is so! It is so!" replied the Blessed One. "Subhūti, an object that is inexpressible neither increases nor decreases. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings who are skilled in means practice the perfection of wisdom, cultivate the perfection of wisdom, and persevere in the perfection of wisdom, they do not think, 'I am enhanced by the perfection of wisdom. I am enhanced by the perfection of meditative concentration. I am enhanced by the perfection of perseverance. I am enhanced by the perfection of tolerance. I am enhanced by the perfection of ethical discipline. I am enhanced by the perfection of generosity.' On the other hand, they do think, 'This perfection of generosity is merely a name. {Ki.IV: 174} These perfections of ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom are merely names.' When they practice the perfection of generosity, they dedicate their attention, their setting of the mind on enlightenment, and their roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they make this dedication definitively, in accordance with unsurpassed, complete enlightenment." [F.381.a]

41.44 "Blessed Lord, what is the nature of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"Subhūti, the real nature of all phenomena is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment," replied the Blessed One.

41.45 "Blessed Lord, of what is the real nature unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "the real nature of physical forms is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. The real nature of nirvāṇa is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That [real nature] neither increases nor decreases. [F.381.b]

41.46 “Subhūti, in the case of bodhisattva great beings who constantly and uninterruptedly act without lacking the perfection of wisdom, they do not observe anything that increases or decreases. So it is, Subhūti, that an inexpressible object is without increase or decrease. Thus, Subhūti, the perfection of generosity is without increase or decrease. The perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are also without increase or decrease. The emptiness of internal phenomena is also without increase or decrease. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are also without increase or decrease. The applications of mindfulness are also without increase or decrease. The correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are also without increase or decrease. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are also without increase or decrease. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are also without increase or decrease. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom by way of nonincrease and nondecrease.”

41.47 “Blessed Lord, do bodhisattva great beings [F.382.a] attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment, or else do bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their final setting of the mind on enlightenment? Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment, {Ki.IV: 175} then the initial setting of the mind on enlightenment would not be associated with the final setting of the mind on enlightenment, nor would the final setting of the mind on enlightenment be associated with the initial setting of the mind on enlightenment. Blessed Lord, if in that manner the phenomena constituting mind and its mental states are not in association, how will the roots of virtuous action be accumulated? Without accumulating the roots of virtuous action, it is impossible to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment."

41.48 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "in order that you may understand this matter, I will teach an example, since some learned persons understand the meaning that is explained by means of an example. Subhūti, in the case of a burning oil lamp, the wick will be burnt out, but will it be burnt out by the touch of the first flame or will it be burnt out by the touch of the final flame?"

41.49 "Blessed Lord, the wick will not be burnt out by the touch of the first flame, nor will it be burnt out without depending on the first flame. Blessed Lord, the wick will not be burnt out by the touch of the last flame, nor will it be burnt out without depending on the final flame."

41.50 "Well then, Subhūti, do you think that that wick will be burnt out?" asked the Blessed One. [F.382.b]

"Blessed Lord, it will be burnt out! Sugata, it will be burnt out!"

41.51 "Subhūti, in the same way bodhisattva great beings do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by means of the initial setting of the mind on enlightenment, nor do bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment independent of the initial setting of the mind on enlightenment. Bodhisattva great beings do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by means of the final setting of the mind on enlightenment, nor do bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment independent of the final setting of the mind on enlightenment. And yet, it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. In this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, starting from the time when they first set their minds on enlightenment, they will perfect the ten levels and thereafter attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment."

41.52 "Blessed Lord, what are the ten levels by perfecting which bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "after perfecting (1) the level of bright insight, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.383.a] After perfecting (2) the level of the spiritual family, (3) the eighth-lowest level, (4) the level of insight, (5) the level of attenuated refinement, (6) the level of no attachment, and (7) the level of [an arhat's] spiritual achievement, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.IV: 176} After perfecting (8) the level of the pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. After perfecting (9) the level of the bodhisattvas, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. After perfecting (10) the level of the buddhas, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Bodhisattva great beings who train in those ten levels will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment, nor will they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment independent of their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment. They will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their final setting of the mind on enlightenment, nor will they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment independent of their final setting of the mind on enlightenment. And yet, they will indeed attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment."

41.53 "Blessed Lord, in this way bodhisattva great beings will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment, [F.383.b] nor will they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment independent of their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment; and bodhisattva great beings will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through their final setting of the mind on enlightenment, nor will they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment independent of their final setting of the mind on enlightenment. And yet, Blessed Lord, they will still attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. That is profound dependent origination!"

41.54 "Subhūti, do you think that thoughts that have ceased will arise again?" asked the Blessed One.

"No, Blessed Lord!"

41.55 "Subhūti, do you think that thoughts that have arisen have the characteristic of cessation?" asked the Blessed One.

"Blessed Lord, they do have the characteristic of cessation. Sugata, they do have the characteristic of cessation!"

41.56 "Subhūti, do you think that that which has the characteristic of cessation will cease to be so?" asked the Blessed One.

- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.57 “Will it dwell definitively, just like the real nature?” asked the Blessed One.
- “Blessed Lord, it will dwell definitively, just like the real nature.”
{Ki.IV: 177}
- 41.58 The Blessed One then asked, “Subhūti, [F.384.a] if it dwells definitively, just like the real nature, will it not become a permanent state?”⁴⁶⁶
- “It would not, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.59 “Subhūti, do you think that the real nature is profound?” asked the Blessed One.
- “Blessed Lord, it is profound.”
- 41.60 “Subhūti, do you think that the mind is also the real nature?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.61 “Subhūti, do you think that the mind is other than the real nature?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.62 “Is the real nature present in the mind?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.63 “Is the mind present in the real nature?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.64 “Does the real nature observe the real nature?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.65 “Subhūti, do you think that those who practice in that manner are practicing the perfection of wisdom?” asked the Blessed One.
- “Blessed Lord, those who practice in that manner do practice the perfection of wisdom.”
- 41.66 “Subhūti, what do you think it is that those who practice in that manner are practicing?” asked the Blessed One.
- “Blessed Lord, those who practice in that manner do not practice anything at all. If you ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom and dwell in the real nature do not indulge in habitual thoughts, and they do not experience them. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, [F.384.b] the real nature is not habituated to anything at all—it is not habituated at all, even to itself.”
- 41.67 “Subhūti, in what do bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom actually engage?” asked the Blessed One.
- “They engage in ultimate reality where dualistic habitual thoughts are nonexistent.”

- 41.68 “Subhūti, do you think that those who engage in ultimate reality engage in habitual thoughts or do they engage in conceptual images?” asked the Blessed One.
- “They do not, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.69 “Subhūti, do you think that they have annihilated the perception of conceptual images?” asked the Blessed One. {Ki.IV: 178}
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 41.70 The Blessed One then asked, “How then do bodhisattva great beings accordingly annihilate the perception of conceptual images?”⁴⁶⁷
- 41.71 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom do not apply themselves, wondering whether they should annihilate conceptual images, or whether they should annihilate nonconceptual images. Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment without having perfected the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Blessed Lord, it is the skill in means of bodhisattva great beings through which they do not make anything at all into an entity, and through which they do not make anything at all into a nonentity. [F.385.a] If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because bodhisattva great beings, in order that the intrinsic defining characteristics of all phenomena might be known as emptiness, dwell in that emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics. If they then become absorbed in the three meditative stabilities for the sake of beings, and bring beings to maturity through these meditative stabilities, how, Blessed Lord, do those bodhisattva great beings become absorbed in the three meditative stabilities and bring beings to maturity through those meditative stabilities?”
- 41.72 The Blessed One replied, “In this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings dwell in the three meditative stabilities and they establish in emptiness those beings who indulge in the perception of discriminating thoughts. They establish in signlessness those beings who indulge in conceptual images. They unite in wishlessness those beings who indulge in aspirations. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, dwell in the three meditative stabilities, and bring beings to maturity.”
- 41.73 This completes the forty-first chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 42

- 42.1 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the venerable Subhūti, “Venerable Subhūti, when certain bodhisattva great beings are absorbed in the three meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness in their dreams, are they enhanced by the perfection of wisdom?” [F.385.b]
- 42.2 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra,” replied Subhūti, “if they are enhanced by cultivating it during the day, they would also be enhanced by cultivating it in their dreams. If you ask why, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, they are without discriminating thoughts concerning dreams and daytime experiences. Venerable Śāradvatīputra, if {Ki.IV: 179} bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom during the day do cultivate the perfection of wisdom, then bodhisattva great beings will also cultivate the perfection of wisdom in their dreams.”
- 42.3 “Venerable Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings perform an action in their dreams, will that action accumulate or diminish? If, as the Blessed One has said, all phenomena are like dreams, then there would be no accumulation or diminution. If you ask why, there is no accumulation or diminution of anything at all that is apprehended in dreams. But if, on waking up, one ponders it, then there will indeed be an accumulation or diminution of that [action].”
- 42.4 Subhūti replied, “If one who has committed an act of killing by day and one who has committed an act of killing in a dream were to think, ‘I have killed. It is right that I have killed,’ in that case, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, what would you say about that action?”
- 42.5 “Venerable Subhūti, no action will occur without an objective support. No volition will occur without an objective support.”
- 42.6 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, it is so!” replied Subhūti. “No action will occur without an objective support. No volition will occur without an objective support. Actions will occur with an objective support, but not without an objective support. Volition will occur with an objective support, but not without an objective support. The mind engages with phenomena that are seen, heard, thought of, and appraised. [F.386.a] The mind does not engage with phenomena that are unseen, unheard, not thought of, and not appraised. On that basis some minds grasp afflicted mental states, and some minds grasp purified mental states. Therefore, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, actions occur with an objective support, but not without an objective support. Volition occurs with an objective support, but not without an objective support.”

42.7 “Venerable Subhūti, if, as the Blessed One has said, all actions and all volitions are void, how then do actions occur with an objective support, but not without an objective support? How do volitions occur with an objective support, but not without an objective support?”

42.8 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra,” replied Subhūti, “following the creation of a conceptual image, actions occur with an objective support, but do not without an objective support. Volitions occur with an objective support, but not without an objective support.”

42.9 “Venerable Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings in their dreams have dispensed generosity, maintained ethical discipline, practiced tolerance, undertaken perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, {Ki.IV: 180} and cultivated wisdom, and then they dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, would they actually dedicate them to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

42.10 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra,” replied Subhūti, “since the bodhisattva great being Maitreya is destined for only one more rebirth and has been manifestly prophesied by the Blessed One as irreversible, you should ask him, and he will answer this point.”

42.11 Thereupon the venerable Śāradvatīputra [F.386.b] asked the bodhisattva great being Maitreya, “Noble son, this elder Subhūti has said, ‘The bodhisattva great being Maitreya has been manifestly prophesied by the Blessed One as irreversible because he is destined for only one more rebirth. You should ask him, and he will answer this point!’ ”

42.12 The bodhisattva great being Maitreya then said to the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Will this one named the bodhisattva great being Maitreya answer? Or will physical forms answer? Or will feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness answer? Or else will the emptiness of physical forms answer? Will the emptiness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness answer? Or else will the real nature of physical forms answer? Will the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness answer? The emptiness of physical forms and the emptiness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness has no ability to answer. The real nature of physical forms and the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness has no ability to answer. I do not observe anything that would answer, by which an answer is given,⁴⁶⁸ or with respect to which an answer is given. I do not observe anything that is prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, anything by which that is prophesied, or anything with respect to which that is prophesied. [F.387.a] All these phenomena are not two things and are not to be divided into two.”

42.13 Śāradvatīputra then asked, “Have you realized those phenomena, just as you have explained them?”

“I have not realized those phenomena, just as I have explained them,” replied Maitreya.

42.14 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra thought, “This bodhisattva great being Maitreya is endowed with profound wisdom. He has indeed revealed this, having over a long period of time practiced the perfection of generosity, and practiced the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. He has revealed this, having practiced without apprehending anything.” {Ki.IV:181}

42.15 Then the Blessed One asked the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Śāradvatīputra, do you think you can observe anything by which you are declared to be an arhat?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

42.16 “Śāradvatīputra, so it is!” said the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom do not think, ‘This is the thing that is prophesied. This is the thing that will be prophesied. This is the thing that has been prophesied. This is the thing that will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’ Bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner practice the perfection of wisdom. Hesitation will not arise in them. They will not think that they themselves will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Rather, they will think that they themselves will undoubtedly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.387.b] Śāradvatīputra, those who practice in that manner practice the perfection of wisdom. Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner will not fear, they will not be afraid, and they will not be terrified. They will not think that they themselves will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Rather, they will think that they themselves will undoubtedly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

42.17 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings complete the six perfections and also approach all-aspect omniscience?”

42.18 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti as follows: “In this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity, if they see beings who are hungry, or if they see beings who are thirsty, with poor clothing, or lacking food, clothing, and bedding, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. I will practice the perfection of generosity in that manner until the resources and felicity of that buddhafiield resemble the resources and felicity of the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm, and the gods of the Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, and Paranirmitavaśavartin realms.’ Subhūti, [F.388.a] bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the perfection of generosity. They will also approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

42.19 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of ethical discipline, if they see persons who kill living creatures; those who steal, commit sexual misconduct, tell lies, speak slanderously, and speak words that are harsh and words that are nonsensical; those who have thoughts of desire, thoughts of malice, {Ki.IV: 182} and hold wrong views—or if they see those who are short-lived, having many illnesses, of poor complexion, with little strength, with few resources, and of low status, or beings with disabled limbs—they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. I will practice the perfection of ethical discipline in that manner until all beings are established in the way of the ten virtuous actions.’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the perfection of ethical discipline. They will also approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

42.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of tolerance, if they see beings acting maliciously toward one another, striking and hitting out with clods of earth, with clubs and swords, depriving others of their lives, they should reflect, [F.388.b] ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. I will practice the perfection of tolerance until all beings think of all other beings as their mother, think of them as their father, think of them as their brother, think of them as their sister, think of them with loving kindness, and think of them with altruism.’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the perfection of tolerance. They will also approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

42.21 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of perseverance, if they see beings who are languid and indolent, and who have turned against the three vehicles, namely, the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the vehicle of the buddhas, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. All beings will indeed undertake resolute perseverance and attain final nirvāṇa through the three vehicles.’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the perfection of perseverance. They will also approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

42.22 “Moreover, Subhūti, [F.389.a] when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of meditative concentration, if they see beings who are clouded by the five obscurations, namely, craving for sensual pleasures, malice, dullness and sleep, agitation and regret, and doubt, {Ki.IV: 183} or see them lacking the first meditative concentration; see them lacking the second, third, and fourth meditative concentrations; see them lacking loving kindness; see them lacking compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity; see them lacking absorption in the sphere of infinite space; and see them lacking absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, then they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. I will practice the perfection of meditative concentration until all beings attain the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the perfection of meditative concentration. They will also approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

42.23 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they see beings immersed in stupidity, [F.389.b] who lack genuine views, whether mundane or supramundane, who propound inaction, who propound nonexistence, who propound nihilism, or who propound eternalism to beings, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. I will practice the perfection of wisdom until all beings have abandoned all such aspects of false view and dwell in the perfection of wisdom. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the perfection of wisdom. They will also approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

42.24 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings belonging to the three categories—of certain receptivity, of unpredictable receptivity, and of certain nonreceptivity—they should then reflect, ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until, at the least, not even the words beings of certain nonreceptivity will be heard any longer and it will not be possible for beings to belong to that category. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ [F.390.a] Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.25 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings who have been born in the hells, or if they see beings in the animal realm, or beings in the world of Yama, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until, at the least, not even the words the three inferior realms will be heard any longer, and it will not be possible for beings to be born in them. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ {Ki.IV: 184} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see that this earth is scarred with tree stumps, thorn bushes, jungle ravines, precipices, sewage, and cesspits, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these faults of beings will in each and every way not occur and they will be impossible. [F.390.b] I will practice the six perfections until this buddhafiels is level like the palm of a hand. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

- 42.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see that this great earth is made of clay, and lacking in gold and silver, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until this great earth is fashioned of blue beryl, and strewn with sands of gold. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.
- 42.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings indulging in acquisitiveness, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, beings will not indulge in acquisitiveness. [F.391.a] That will be impossible. I will practice the six perfections until all beings are without possessiveness and without acquisitiveness. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.
- 42.29 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see the four social classes, namely, the royal class, the priestly class, the merchant class, and the laboring class, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until, at the very least, even the names of the four social classes are no longer heard. That will be impossible. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.IV: 185}
- 42.30 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings of higher, average, and lower status, and if they see beings of upper classes and lower classes, [F.391.b] they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until these faults of beings no longer occur and are impossible. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.
- 42.31 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings of different color, they should reflect, “In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until beings can no longer be distinguished by their color, and that to so distinguish them is impossible. Rather, all beings will acquire a fine and splendid physique, beautiful to behold, and the finest of complexions. I will refine the buddhafi elds! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.32 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings with feudal masters, they should reflect, [F.392.a] ‘In this buddhafi eld where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until even the designation feudal master is no longer heard and to have such positions will be impossible. Rather, the kings of the Dharma—tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas—will be present. I will refine the buddhafi elds! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.33 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see the different pathways of beings, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafi eld where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, the different pathways of beings—the god realms, the human realm, the realms of the denizens of the hells, the animal realm, and the world of Yama—will be nonexistent, and to follow them will be impossible. In their place, all beings will follow a single pathway. {Ki.IV: 186} I will practice the six perfections until they are not separated from the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, [F.392.b] the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. I will refine the buddhafi elds! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.34 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see the four distinct modes of birth of beings, namely oviparous birth, viviparous birth, birth from heat and moisture, and miraculous birth, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafi eld where I will have

by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until the three [lower] modes of birth [of beings]—oviparous birth, viviparous birth, and birth from heat and moisture—do not occur, and would be impossible. In their place, all beings will be born miraculously. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.35 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings lacking the five extrasensory powers, they should reflect, [F.393.a] ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until all beings are endowed with the five extrasensory powers. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.36 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see the excrement and urine of beings, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until all beings partake of the nourishment of the Dharma, the nourishment of delight, and the nourishment of meditative concentration. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience. [V28] [B53] [F.1.b]

42.37 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings bereft of luminosity, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, {Ki.IV: 187} I will practice the six perfections until luminosity absolutely emerges from all beings themselves. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.38 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings [F.2.a] practice the six perfections, if they see among beings the temporal divisions of day, night, month, fortnight,⁴⁶⁹ season, and year, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until even the words for the temporal divisions of day, night, month, fortnight, season, and year, as employed by beings, are unknown and no longer exist. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.39 "Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings bereft of long life, they should reflect, 'In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until all beings possess an inestimable lifespan. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly [F.2.b] will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.40 "Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings bereft of the major marks, they should reflect, 'In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until all beings possess the thirty-two major marks of a great person. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.41 "Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings bereft of the roots of virtuous action, they should reflect, 'In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until all beings possess the roots of virtuous action, and honor the lord buddhas with the roots of their virtuous actions. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.IV: 188} [F.3.a]

42.42 "Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings afflicted by disease, they should reflect, 'In this buddhafiels where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until beings are free from the four kinds of disease, namely wind disorders, bile disorders, phlegm disorders, and combined humoral disorders. I will refine the buddhafiels! I will bring beings to maturity!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

- 42.43 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see beings smitten by the three afflicted mental states, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until for all beings the afflicted mental states of desire, hatred, and delusion no longer arise, and all beings are indeed bereft of desire, hatred, and delusion. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.
- 42.44 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings [F.3.b] practice the six perfections, if they see beings of inferior resolve, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until even the words for the two [lower] vehicles—the vehicle of the śrāvakas and the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas—are no longer heard, and until all beings indeed have set out for all-aspect omniscience. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.
- 42.45 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, if they see conceited beings, they should reflect, ‘In this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until even the word conceited is no longer heard, and, apart from that, until all beings indeed understand genuine reality and are without conceit. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ {Ki.IV: 189} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.
- 42.46 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, they should reflect, [F.4.a] ‘In this buddhafiield where I attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment merely with a limited lifespan, a limited luminosity, and a limited community of monks, but in this buddhafiield where I will have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will practice the six perfections until I have an immeasurable lifespan, an immeasurable luminosity, and an immeasurable community of monks. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.47 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, they should reflect, ‘I will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment merely by transforming a few worlds into my buddhafiield, but when I have by all means attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, as many worlds as there are, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, will become one with my buddhafiield. I will refine the buddhafiields! I will bring beings to maturity!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.

42.48 “Moreover, Subhūti, [F.4.b] when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, they should reflect, ‘Alas! This cyclic existence is long-lasting. Alas! This world of beings is infinite.’ They should be focus their attention correctly, saying, ‘Alas! This cyclic existence is limitless like space. Alas! This world of beings is limitless like space. But in it there is no cyclic existence, nor is there nirvāṇa. Rather, terms such as being, cyclic existence, and nirvāṇa are merely conventional designations.’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will indeed complete the six perfections. They will also approach all-aspect omniscience.”

42.49 This completes the forty-second chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 43: GAṄGADEVĪ

- 43.1 Then a woman named Gaṅgadevī arrived in that assembly and took her seat. Then, after rising from her seat, with her upper robe over one shoulder, she rested her right knee on the ground. Placing her hands together in the gesture of homage, she bowed toward the Blessed One {Ki.IV: 190} and said, “Blessed Lord, I too will complete the six perfections. I will acquire such a buddhafiield as has been described by the Tathāgata, Arhat, completely awakened Buddha in this Perfection of Wisdom.” Then that woman bundled together golden flowers, silver flowers, flowers from water plants, flowers from the plains, all sorts of ornaments, and golden colored robes, and she cast them toward that place when the Blessed One was. [F.5.a] Immediately after she had cast those flowers, ornaments, and robes, bundled together, then by the power of the buddhas, there appeared a towering mansion in the sky directly above the head of the Blessed One—rectangular in shape, supported by four columns, well proportioned, and most delightful, its luster pleasing to the mind. Then indeed the woman dedicated that towering mansion to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, making common cause with all beings.
- 43.2 At that time the Blessed One understood the aspiration of that woman and smiled, indicative of the true nature of the lord buddhas. When he smiled, many multicolored rays of light were diffused from the Blessed One’s mouth—blue, yellow, red, white, scarlet, crystal, and silver. They extended through infinite and limitless world systems, and then returned, circumambulating the Blessed One clockwise three times before vanishing into the crown of the Blessed One’s head.
- 43.3 Then the venerable Ānanda, with his upper robe over one shoulder, rested his right knee on the ground and, placing his hands together in the gesture of homage, bowed toward the place where the Blessed One was, saying,

“Blessed Lord, since the Tathāgata, Arhat, completely awakened Buddha does not smile without a cause and without conditions, what is the cause and what are the conditions that gave rise to your smile?”

43.4 “Ānanda,” replied the Blessed One, “this sister named Gaṅgadevī will in the future, in the eon called Tāraṅkopama, appear in the world as the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha named Suvarṇapuṣpa. Ānanda, [F.5.b] this is her last birth in a female form. Ānanda, this sister, after this present female form has expired, will acquire a male form and take birth in the realm of Abhirati, the buddhafiield of the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya. There he will be chaste in conduct. Ānanda, the name of that bodhisattva great being will also be Suvarṇapuṣpa. {Ki.IV: 191} Ānanda, when that bodhisattva great being Suvarṇapuṣpa has died and transmigrated, he will proceed from buddhafiield to buddhafiield, and he will never be separated from the lord buddhas. Ānanda, just as a universal monarch may move from palace to palace, without his two feet touching the ground while he is alive, until the time of his death, in the same way, Ānanda, the bodhisattva great being Suvarṇapuṣpa will also proceed from buddhafiield to buddhafiield, until he has attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

43.5 Then the venerable Ānanda thought, “All the bodhisattva great beings, as many as there are gathered in that buddhafiield, should be regarded as a congregation of tathāgatas.”

43.6 The Blessed One, comprehending the thoughts in the mind of the venerable Ānanda, said to the venerable Ānanda, “Ānanda, it is so! It is just as you have thought. All the bodhisattva great beings, as many as there are gathered in the buddhafiield of the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Suvarṇapuṣpa, should be regarded as a congregation of tathāgatas. His community of monks will also be immeasurable. It will be impossible to grasp the extent of his community of monks by saying, [for example], [F.6.a] that there are so many hundreds of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many thousands of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many hundred thousands of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many tens of millions of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many billions of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many tens of billions of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many trillions of śrāvakas in his community of monks, or that there are so many million trillions of śrāvakas in his community of monks. Rather, they will number countless, incalculably many hundred trillions of trillions. Ānanda, in that buddhafiield where the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Suvarṇapuṣpa will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all the faults that are taught about in this Perfection of Wisdom will not arise and they will be nonexistent.”

43.7 Ānanda then asked, “Blessed Lord, in the presence of which tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha did this sister make offerings, cultivating the roots of virtuous action and setting her mind on irreversible [enlightenment]?”

43.8 “Ānanda,” replied the Blessed One, “this sister cultivated the roots of virtuous action in the presence of the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Dīpaṃkara, and set her mind upon unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. She indeed dedicated those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. To strive for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment she also cast these same golden flowers upon the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Dīpaṃkara. Ānanda, at the time when I cast five blue lotuses toward the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Dīpaṃkara in order to strive for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, {Ki.IV:192} [F.6.b] the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Dīpaṃkara knew that I had acquired the roots of virtuous action, and prophesied that I would attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. At that time, this sister also heard the prophetic declaration concerning me and set her mind upon [enlightenment], thinking, ‘Just as it has been prophesied of this brahmin child, may I too in the future be prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ Ānanda, so it was that this sister initially set her mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment in the presence of that tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha.”

43.9 “Blessed Lord, this sister has indeed undertaken training for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!” exclaimed Ānanda.

43.10 “Ānanda, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is just as you have said. Ānanda, this sister has trained for the sake of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

43.11 This completes the forty-third chapter, “Gaṅgadevī,” from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 44

44.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how should bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom investigate⁴⁷⁰ emptiness? How should they be absorbed in the meditative stability of emptiness? How should they investigate signlessness? How should they be absorbed in the meditative stability of signlessness? How should they investigate wishlessness? How should they be absorbed in the meditative stability of wishlessness? How should they investigate the four applications of mindfulness? [F.7.a] How should they cultivate the four applications of mindfulness? How should they investigate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? How should they cultivate the noble eightfold path [and those other causal attributes]. How should they investigate the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? How should they cultivate the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and those other fruitional attributes]?”

44.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should determine that physical forms are empty. They should determine that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty. They should determine that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty. They should determine that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty. They should determine that [all the causal and fruitful attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are empty. They should determine that the realm of desire is empty. They should determine that the realm of form and the realm of formlessness are empty. By whatever means they make such determinations, they should do so with an unwavering mind. [F.7.b] One whose mind is unwavering does not observe those phenomena. One who does not observe those phenomena, does not actualize them. {Ki.IV: 193} If you ask why, it is because such bodhisattva great beings will have trained with regard to all phenomena, which are empty of their own defining characteristics. They do not delimit any phenomenon. They do not observe anything that brings into being, anything that is to be brought into being, or anything by which bringing into being takes place.”

44.3 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, when the Blessed One said that bodhisattva great beings should not actualize phenomena that are empty, how then, Blessed Lord, do bodhisattva great beings dwell in emptiness and not actualize emptiness?”

44.4 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings determine the emptiness endowed with all its finest aspects, they do not think, ‘I actualize it! I will actualize it!’ They do not think, ‘I should actualize it!’ Rather, they think, ‘I should thoroughly investigate it.’ And they think, ‘This is the time for investigation, but this is not the time for actualization.’ Bodhisattva great beings, when not in a state of absorption, focus their minds on perceptual objects and without any interruption on that account do not lapse from the factors conducive to enlightenment. Yet they do not actualize the state that is free from contaminants. If you ask why, it is because bodhisattva great beings are endowed with such extensive wisdom. They are established in the factors conducive to enlightenment, and know accordingly, ‘This is the time for investigation, not the time for actualization.’

44.5 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great [F.8.a] beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should determine, ‘This is the time for the perfection of generosity. This is the time for the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. This is the time for cultivating the applications of mindfulness. This is the time for cultivating the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. This is the time for cultivating emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. This is the time for acquiring the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. This is the time for acquiring the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, {Ki.IV: 194} and the eighteen distinct attributes of the buddhas. This is the time for acquiring great loving kindness and great compassion.'

44.6 " 'However, this is not the time for actualizing the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. This is not the time for actualizing the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or the fruit of arhatship. This is not the time for actualizing the wisdom of the pratyekabuddhas. This is the time for acquiring and not relinquishing all-aspect omniscience!'

44.7 "Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom accordingly, they investigate emptiness and they course through emptiness. They investigate signlessness and they course through signlessness. They investigate wishlessness and they course through wishlessness. [F.8.b] They cultivate the applications of mindfulness and they course through the applications of mindfulness. They cultivate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, and the branches of enlightenment, and they course through the branches of enlightenment [and so forth]. They cultivate the noble eightfold path, and yet they do not actualize it. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings investigate the factors conducive to enlightenment. They cultivate the factors conducive to enlightenment. They course through the factors conducive to enlightenment. But they do not actualize the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They do not actualize the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, the fruit of arhatship, or individual enlightenment.

44.8 "As an analogy, Subhūti, supposing there was a heroic man, expert, steadfast, of fine physique, handsome, beautiful to behold, fair-complexioned, fully developed, and well trained in archery, who had also handled sharp weapons, perfected all the sixty-four crafts,⁴⁷¹ fully mastered all the arts and fields of activity, and who was pleasing to many people and congenial. He would acquire great rewards in all the tasks he had to undertake and on account of those rewards, in the presence of many people, he would be served, respected, honored, and worshiped, causing him to greatly rejoice, in joy, utter joy, and comfort. If he were then, for some purpose, to escort his parents, child, and wife, entering a hair-raising wilderness where childlike persons are afraid, on entering into it, that man would fearlessly exhort his parents, child, and wife, {Ki.IV: 195} 'Do not fear! Do not be afraid! I will swiftly get you out and swiftly release you from this fearful and uncomfortable wilderness.' [F.9.a] Even if murderous enemies and many assailants were to harass him in that wilderness, he, being endowed with the supreme power of wisdom, would lead his parents, child, and wife from that wilderness and free them safely and without affliction, getting them back to a village, city, market town, or inhabited district, unharmed and uninjured, joyful and comfortable, and his mind would be without enmity toward those beings who were his enemies and assailants. If you ask why, it is because that man has mastered all the crafts, in consequence of which he can in that wilderness conjure other assault forces that are for the most part more numerous, more heroic, and better armed than those assailants. All those assailants would disappear out of fear, and that man, having released his parents, child, and wife without affliction, would then dwell at ease.

44.9 “Similarly, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings maintain [a state of mind] imbued with thoughts that direct loving kindness, and with thoughts that direct compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity toward all beings, at that time, those bodhisattva great beings are established in the four immeasurable attitudes and they complete the six perfections. After completing these, while not achieving the cessation of contaminants, they will investigate all-aspect omniscience. Established in the gateways to liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—they investigate all-aspect omniscience. At that time bodhisattva great beings do not course through signs, and they do not actualize any meditative stability of signlessness, so that they do not actualize [F.9.b] anything that would cause them to dwell on the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

44.10 “As an analogy, Subhūti, a bird moves through the air and does not fall to the ground. It flies through the sky or the air but does not dwell in them. Similarly, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings investigate emptiness, and they also course in emptiness. They investigate signlessness and wishlessness, and they also course in signlessness and wishlessness. But they do not actualize emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, which, when actualized, would cause them to lapse into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, without perfecting the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. {Ki.IV:196}

44.11 “As an analogy, Subhūti, when a powerful man who is a master of archery, extremely well trained in archery, fires an arrow far into the sky, and then fires a succession of other arrows, one after another, he can prevent that first arrow from falling to the ground. Indeed, it will not fall to the ground as long as he does not make the wish, ‘Now I should let that arrow fall to the ground!’ But when he ceases to fire the subsequent arrows, the arrows would all fall to the ground in succession, one after the other. Similarly,

Subhūti, as long as bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom that is retained by skill in means, they do not actualize the genuine very limit of reality until the roots of virtuous action have been brought to maturity in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.10.a] But when those roots of virtuous action have been brought to maturity in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they do actualize the authentic very limit of reality. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should make a definitive analysis in accord with the reality of these phenomena.”

44.12 Then [the venerable Subhūti] said, “Blessed Lord, how wonderful it is, Blessed Lord, that while bodhisattva great beings train in this reality, train in the very limit of reality, train in the real nature, train in the realm of phenomena, train in [the aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of independent characteristics, and train in the three gateways to liberation, the difficult achievement is that they do not lapse in the interim from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Sugata, this is most amazing!”

44.13 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this is because such bodhisattva great beings do not forsake any beings. Subhūti, such are the extraordinary aspirations of those bodhisattva great beings who have not forsaken any beings. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings magnanimously think, ‘I will not forsake any beings. I should release all these beings who maintain inauthentic doctrines.’ When bodhisattva great beings skillfully actualize the meditative stability of emptiness as a gateway to liberation, when they actualize the meditative stability of signlessness as a gateway to liberation, and when they actualize the meditative stability of wishlessness as a gateway to liberation, one should know that they do not actualize the very limit of reality in the interim until they have attained all-aspect omniscience. [F.10.b]

44.14 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings seek to analyze the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of both external and internal phenomena, [and the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, {Ki.IV: 197} as well as the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the three gateways to liberation, and those [other] profound topics, they magnanimously think, ‘I will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and teach the Dharma in order that these beings—who, over a long period of time, have been practicing by way of apprehending, owing to the notion of self, the notion of beings, the notion of life forms, the notion of living beings, the notion of life, the notion of living creatures, the notion of individual personalities, the notion of human beings, the notion of people, the notion of actors, the notion of experiencers, and the notion of the experiencing subject—might abandon their apprehendings!’ At that time, even though bodhisattva great beings become absorbed in the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the gateways to liberation—they do not actualize the very limit of reality through which the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is attained, through which the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship are attained, and through which individual enlightenment is attained.

44.15 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who set their minds on enlightenment in that manner, who possess the roots of virtuous action and are endowed with skillful means, will also not, in the interim, actualize the very limit of reality. Nor will the perfection of generosity be diminished. [F.11.a] Nor will the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom be diminished. Nor will the emptiness of internal phenomena [and the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, be diminished. Nor will the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path be diminished. Nor will the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions be diminished. Nor will the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, or wishlessness be diminished. Nor will the five extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, or unsurpassed, complete enlightenment be diminished.

44.16 “Subhūti, so it is that when bodhisattva great beings are endowed with the factors conducive to enlightenment, they will not be diminished until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Those bodhisattva great beings who have been favored with skill in means {Ki.IV: 198} are enhanced by virtuous attributes, and their sense faculties become keener, unlike the sense faculties of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

44.17 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings think, [F.11.b] ‘For a long period of time these beings have been engaging in four misconceptions, namely the notion of permanence, the notion of happiness, the notion of self, and the notion that existence is pleasant. So I should attain enlightenment for their sake. When I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, by whatever means I should teach them the Dharma that the notion of permanence, the notion of happiness, the notion of self, and the notion of the pleasant are without basis.’ Since they have set their minds accordingly on enlightenment and practice the perfection of wisdom through skill in means, they will not actualize the very limit of reality until they have perfected the ten powers of the tathāgatas, and until they have perfected the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion. At that time, even though bodhisattva great beings may have become absorbed in the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the gateways of liberation—they will not actualize the very limit of reality until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

44.18 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings think, ‘For a long period of time these beings have engaged, by way of apprehending, in the concept of self; or the concepts of sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, and viewers; or the concept of physical forms; or the concepts of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; or the concept of the sense fields, the concept of the sensory elements, the concept of the links of dependent origination, the concept of the perfections, the concept of the aspects of emptiness, [F.12.a] the concept of the factors conducive to enlightenment, and the concepts of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; or the concepts of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; or the concepts of the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; or the concepts of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Therefore, on their behalf, when by whatever means I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will ensure that the faults in the apprehending of beings are eliminated!’

44.19 “Those who have set their minds on enlightenment in that manner and who practice the perfection of wisdom, endowed with skill in means, do not actualize the very limit of reality until they have perfected the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion. At that time, bodhisattva great beings will perfect the cultivation of the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness.

44.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they think, ‘For a long period of time these beings have engaged with signs, that is to say, they have engaged with signs denoting the female gender; signs denoting the male gender; signs denoting physical forms; {Ki.IV: 199} signs denoting feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; signs denoting the sense fields, sensory elements and links of dependent origination; [F.12.b] signs denoting the perfections, the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment; signs denoting [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and signs denoting [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Therefore, on their behalf, when by whatever means I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will ensure that these faults of beings are eliminated!’ Those who have set their minds on enlightenment in that manner and practice the perfection of wisdom with skill in means will not actualize the very limit of reality until they have perfected the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion. At that time, bodhisattva great beings will perfect the cultivation of the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness.

44.21 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they think, ‘For a long period of time these beings have engaged with aspirations, that is to say, they have aspired to the status of Śakra, the status of Brahmā, the status of a guardian of the world, or the status of a universal monarch. They have aspired to physical forms. They have aspired to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. They have aspired to [all the causal and fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Therefore, on their behalf, I will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. I will teach the Dharma so that by whatever means I will ensure that these faults of the aspirations of beings are eliminated!’ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who have set their minds on enlightenment in that manner and practice the perfection of wisdom with skill in means [F.13.a] will perfect the cultivation of the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the gateways of liberation. They will not actualize the very limit of reality until they have perfected the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion, and so on, until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

44.22 “It is impossible and there is no chance, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the six perfections; who practice the emptiness of internal phenomena and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; who practice the applications of mindfulness; who practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; who practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; who practice the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and who practice the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas—and who investigate them, endowed with the vision of such wisdom—will lapse into that which should not be actualized, or become associated with the three realms. {Ki.IV: 200}

44.23 “It should be asked of bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly and investigate these factors conducive to enlightenment, [F.13.b] ‘How do bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment investigate these [fruitful] attributes, but not actualize emptiness and not actualize the very limit of reality through the realization of which the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is attained, and through which the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment are attained? How do they not actualize signlessness, wishlessness, nonconditioning, nonarising, and nonentity, but do indeed cultivate the perfection of wisdom?’

44.24 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom are questioned by other bodhisattva great beings in that manner, if they respond, saying that they should focus their attention on emptiness, and they should focus their attention on signlessness, wishlessness, nonconditioning, nonarising, noncessation, and nonentity, then, Subhūti, those [other] bodhisattva great beings should know that these bodhisattva great beings have been prophesied by the lord buddhas to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they declare, predict, and distinguish the investigation that irreversible bodhisattva great beings should achieve.

- 44.25 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings are questioned in that manner, if they respond, saying that they should not investigate emptiness, that they should not investigate signlessness, wishlessness, nonconditioning, nonarising, noncessation, and nonentity, and that they should not investigate the factors conducive to enlightenment, then, [F.14.a] Subhūti, those [other] bodhisattva great beings should know that these bodhisattva great beings have not been prophesied by the lord buddhas to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they do not declare, do not predict, and do not distinguish the investigation that irreversible bodhisattva great beings should achieve.
- 44.26 “With regard to those bodhisattva great beings who do not declare, do not predict, and do not distinguish the [fruitful] attributes of irreversible bodhisattva great beings, [other] bodhisattva great beings should know that they will not transcend the level of the attenuated refinement [of the śrāvakas], in the manner in which irreversible bodhisattva great beings have investigated and transcended the level at which progress has become irreversible.”
- 44.27 “Blessed Lord, is there a reason why bodhisattvas may be styled ‘irreversible’?” {Ki.IV:201}
- “Subhūti, there is!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, whether or not bodhisattva great beings have studied the six perfections, irreversible bodhisattvas will respond precisely in the manner of an irreversible bodhisattva great being.”
- 44.28 “Blessed Lord, for that reason there are many who are engaged in [the pursuit of] enlightenment, but there are few who could respond in the manner of an irreversible bodhisattva great being, whether they dwell on the purificatory levels or the nonpurificatory levels.”
- 44.29 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “If you ask why, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings of whom the level of irreversible wisdom has been prophesied are few in number. [F.14.b] Those who have been prophesied will respond correctly. One should know that those who respond correctly have cultivated the roots of virtuous action. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings will not be captivated by the whole world, with its gods, humans, and asuras.”⁴⁷²
- 44.30 This completes the forty-fourth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 45

- 45.1 {Ki.V: 1} Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Subhūti, “Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings, even in their dreams, do not have thoughts of longing for the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and do not think that these [levels] are advantageous—and if they do not actualize anything, regarding all phenomena as like a dream, and regarding them like an echo, a reflection, a mirage, and a phantom—these, Subhūti, should be known as the irreversible defining characteristics of an irreversible bodhisattva.
- 45.2 “Moreover, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings, even in their dreams, see the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha teaching the Dharma with an entourage of many hundreds, an entourage of many thousands, an entourage of many hundred thousands, an entourage of many ten millions, an entourage of many billions, an entourage of many ten billions, an entourage of many trillions, or an entourage of many hundred billion trillions, and surrounded and revered by many monks, nuns, laymen, laywomen, gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas—and if, having listened to that Dharma, [F.15.a] they are seen entering into and abiding in accordance with the Dharma, the meaning of which is to be known, and the attributes of which are to be tended, or entering into it at an appropriate time and engaging with its attributes that are to be tended—these, Subhūti, should also be known as the irreversible defining characteristics of an irreversible bodhisattva.
- 45.3 “Moreover, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings, even in their dreams, see the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha, elevated in the air and teaching the Dharma to a community of monks, endowed with the thirty-two major marks of a great person, with an aureole of light extending a full arm span, demonstrating many miraculous abilities and powers, conjuring many emanations, and performing through those very emanations the deeds of the buddhas in other world systems, these, Subhūti, should also be known as the irreversible defining characteristics of an irreversible bodhisattva. {Ki.V:2}

45.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings, even in their dreams, see the destruction of a town, the destruction of a city, a conflagration, or ferocious wild animals; or see their head being cut off; or, apart from that, see terrifying, unbearable, and frightening phenomena; or see suffering, discomfort, and agitation; or see those who are hungry and thirsty; or see the death of their father, the death of their mother, the death of their brother, the death of their sister, the death of their friend, or the death of their relative, if they do not grieve, are not terrified, and do not fear, and on awakening from that dream if they think, ‘Alas! These three realms are all like a dream. Once I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will teach that all the phenomena of the three realms are like a dream,’ [F.15.b] then, Subhūti, this, too, should be known as the irreversible defining characteristic of an irreversible bodhisattva.

45.5 “Moreover, Subhūti, you may ask how one should know that, when irreversible bodhisattva great beings have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, in that buddhafiield the three lower realms in their entirety will be completely nonexistent in all respects. When bodhisattva great beings see in their dreams beings who are denizens of the hells, or see beings of the animal realm, or beings of the world of Yama, if they then recollect such things and after recollecting them think, ‘Once I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I will act in such a way that in that buddhafiield the three lower realms in their entirety will be completely nonexistent in all respects. Why? Because the dreaming and waking states are not two. They are indivisible,’ then, Subhūti, this, too, should be known as the irreversible defining characteristic of an irreversible bodhisattva.

45.6 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings are dreaming or awake, if a city is perceived to be on fire, and they think, ‘While I am dreaming or awake, if I do possess those aspects, marks, and signs with which irreversible bodhisattva great beings are known to be endowed, then by these truths {Ki.V: 3} and this declaration of truth may this fire that ravages the city be quelled! [F.16.a] May it cool down! May it be extinguished!’ and if [the fire] is then quelled, cools down, and is extinguished, one should know, Subhūti, that these bodhisattva great beings are prophesied to make progress to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment that is irreversible. On the other hand, Subhūti, if, consequent on that declaration of truth, the mass of fire continues to burn from house to house and continues to burn from street to street, burning some houses but not others and burning some streets, not others, then, Subhūti, these bodhisattva great beings, since the houses of some beings have burnt and those of others have not burnt, should know that the past actions of those beings who have accumulated the karma of rejecting the Dharma are being ripened in this lifetime, and it is their residue of past actions caused by their deprecation of the Dharma that is now ripening. Subhūti, these, too, are the causes and conditions for the irreversibility of bodhisattva great beings. Irreversible bodhisattva great beings should be known on account of these causes and conditions.

45.7 “Yet again, Subhūti, I will teach the aspects, marks, and signs through which irreversible bodhisattva great beings should be known. Subhūti, if some woman or man were possessed by a nonhuman spirit, bodhisattva great beings should think, ‘If I have been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, my wishes are utterly pure, and I do desire to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, then I will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.16.b] The directing of my attention toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is utterly pure. I am without the mindset of the śrāvakas and I am without the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas. Since I am without the mindset of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, I will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It is not the case that I shall not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Rather, I undoubtedly will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. There is nothing at all that all the lord buddhas, as many as reside and are alive in countless, immeasurable world systems, and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who teach the Dharma, do not know, do not see, do not comprehend, do not actualize, or with respect to which they do not attain consummate buddhahood. These lord buddhas comprehend my wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If this is the case, then by this truth and by this declaration of truth may this nonhuman spirit who possesses or injures this man or woman depart!’ [Ki.V: 4] Subhūti, if that nonhuman spirit does not depart because a bodhisattva great being has spoken in that manner, then, Subhūti, one should know that this bodhisattva great being has not been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

45.8 “Subhūti, if that nonhuman spirit does depart because a bodhisattva great being has spoken in that manner, [F.17.a] then, Subhūti, one should know that this bodhisattva great being has been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who possess those aspects, marks, and signs are known to be irreversible.

45.9 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil Māra might approach owing to the truth blessing being performed by bodhisattva great beings who have not practiced the six perfections; who are without skill in means; who have not practiced the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; and who have not entered upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas.

45.10 “Subhūti, in the case where such bodhisattva great beings have performed the truth blessing, saying, ‘By this truth and this declaration of truth through which I have been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, may that nonhuman spirit depart!’ the evil Māra will insist that that nonhuman spirit departs by whatever means. If you ask why, it is because the evil Māra is more powerful and more resplendent than that nonhuman spirit. It is through the blessing of the evil Māra that that nonhuman spirit will depart, [F.17.b] and those bodhisattva great beings will think, ‘It was through my power that that nonhuman spirit departed!’ They will not know that the nonhuman spirit actually departed through the power of Māra. On that basis, they will deride, slander, scorn, deprecate, and look down upon other bodhisattva great beings, saying, ‘I have been prophesied by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but these others have not been prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’ Simply on that basis their pride will increase; as their pride grows they will be far removed from all-aspect omniscience. If they are far removed from the wisdom of the unsurpassed, completely awakened buddhas, {Ki.V: 5} one should know that those unskilled bodhisattvas, simply on that basis, will develop overweening pride and they will proceed to the two levels, namely the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. In that manner the deeds of Māra will confront those bodhisattva great beings through the blessing of truth. If they do not serve, attend upon, befriend, and respect spiritual mentors, in that state they will be fettered and bound by Māra. If you ask why, it is because they have not practiced the six perfections and they have not been favored by skill in means. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should know this as the deed of Māra. [B54]

45.11 “Subhūti, if you ask how the evil Māra approaches bodhisattva great beings who have not practiced the six perfections, who have not practiced the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, who have not practiced the three gateways to liberation, [F.18.a] and who have not entered into the maturity [of the bodhisattvas] in connection with the consecration of their [prophesied] name, in this regard, Subhūti, the evil Māra will approach assuming whatever guise is appropriate and say to those bodhisattva great beings, ‘Noble child, the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha prophesies that you will attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. This will be your name. This will be your father’s name. This will be your mother’s name. This will be your brother’s name. This will be your sister’s name. This will be your friend’s name. This will be your minister’s name and your spiritual mentor’s name.’ He will then reveal [the names of] their parents through seven past generations, saying, ‘[You have come]⁴⁷³ from such and such a country, such and such a city, such and such a place, and such and such a district. You will be born in such and such a country, such and such a city, and such and such a town.’ If they are gentle by nature, he will say to them, ‘In the past, too, you were similarly gentle.’ If they are sharp [by nature], he will say to them, ‘In the past, too, you were similarly sharp.’ If they are forest dwellers, he will say to them, ‘In the past, too, you were similarly a forest dweller.’ If they are mendicants who beg for alms, if they are refuse scavengers, if they eat their daily meal in a single sitting, if they subsist only on whatever alms they obtain, if they frequent charnel grounds, if they sit in exposed places, if they sit under trees, if they remain seated [even while asleep], if they stay wherever they happen to be, if they own only three robes, or if they have few desires, if they understand the Dharma, if they are solitary, [F.18.b] if their feet are not dyed with henna, or if they are quietly spoken, then he will say to them, ‘In the past, too, you similarly were quietly spoken, and so on.’ If they are nonbelligerent, he will say to them, ‘In the past, too, you were similarly nonbelligerent.’ {Ki.V: 6} If they ask why, he will say, ‘It is because if you presently maintain such ascetic virtues, you will undoubtedly in the past also have maintained the ascetic virtues and these vows. It is impossible for you not to have done so!’

45.12 “Through such declarations of their former names and clans, and through the declaration of the ascetic virtues and vows that they now maintain, they will give rise to [certain] conceits on the basis of which the evil Māra will approach them, saying, ‘Noble child, inasmuch as you are [now] maintaining these [ascetic] virtues, you have been prophesied by the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha to make irreversible progress toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’ Alternatively, he will approach in the guise of a monk, or he will approach in the guise of a nun, or he will approach in the guise of a householder, or he will approach in the guise of a mother, or he will approach in the guise of a father, and he will say, 'Noble child, you have been prophesied by the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because you maintain all those ascetic virtues that are associated with irreversible bodhisattva great beings.'

45.13 "Subhūti, since those bodhisattva great beings are without the aspects, marks, and signs of an irreversible bodhisattva great being that I have explained, other bodhisattva great beings should know, Subhūti, that these bodhisattva great beings are 'blessed' by Māra. If you ask why, Subhūti, [F.19.a] it is because if those who are indeed without the aspects, marks, and signs of an irreversible bodhisattva great being then deride, slander, scorn, look down upon, and deprecate other bodhisattva great beings, in that case, Subhūti, one should know that this is a deed of Māra associated with bodhisattva great beings who have received the name consecration.

45.14 "Subhūti, one should know that there are also other deeds of Māra associated with bodhisattva great beings who have received the name consecration. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in the case of bodhisattva great beings who have not practiced the six perfections, and who therefore do not understand the demonic force of the aggregates—that is to say, who do not understand physical forms, and who do not understand feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness—the evil Māra will prophesy them through the name consecration, saying, 'When you have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, this will be your name!' And in doing so he will declare the very name that that bodhisattva great being had already pondered and reflected upon. Thereupon, bodhisattva great beings who are stupid and without skill in means will think, 'This very name that I have considered, pondered, and reflected upon in my own mind {Ki.V: 7} will be my name when I attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!' Whatever the evil Māra, or a deity of the realm of Māra, or monks who are under the charismatic influence of Māra might declare, those [bodhisattva great beings] will think, 'The name that I have already pondered corresponds to the name that has been precisely declared by this monk, under which I am prophesied by the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!' [F.19.b]

45.15 "Then, Subhūti, if those bodhisattvas lack the aspects, marks, and signs of an irreversible bodhisattva great being that I have explained, and if, just by the declaration of the name that is prophesied, they look down upon other bodhisattva great beings, on the basis of that conceit they will be far from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. One should know that there are two levels associated with those who lack skill in means, who are without the perfection of wisdom, are without a spiritual mentor, and captivated by the friendship of Māra—namely, the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Either, after roaming and straying through cyclic existence again and again over an extremely long period of time, and after honoring, attending upon, and serving a spiritual mentor, they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, dependent on this very perfection of wisdom, or, Subhūti, if bodhisattvas have repeatedly not observed and honored a spiritual mentor, and, having reincarnated, do not scorn and do not confess their former mindsets, then one should know that they will proceed to [either of] those two levels, namely the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. This is just as when a monk who follows the vehicle of the śrāvakas, after committing any one of the four root downfalls, ceases to be a virtuous ascetic and is no longer a son of the Śākya, and even in that very lifetime would lack the fortune to attain any of the fruits of a virtuous ascetic that are included among the four fruits of a virtuous ascetic. In the same way, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who develop a mindset possessed of conceits, simply on the basis of that name that has been declared, [F.20.a] will on the basis of that mere declaration develop a mindset that derides, slanders, and deprecates other bodhisattvas. There is nothing more onerous than that! Subhūti, such are the subtlest of the deeds of Māra that arise through the name consecration. Subhūti, leave aside the four root downfalls. {Ki.V: 8} This development of the mindset of bodhisattvas who give rise to conceits simply on the basis of the name consecration is even more onerous than the five inexpressible crimes. One should know that this mindset is even more onerous than those [crimes].

- 45.16 “Moreover, Subhūti, the evil Māra might declare the virtue of isolation and approach bodhisattva great beings, saying, ‘The tathāgatas speak of the virtue of isolation.’ Subhūti, I do not teach that bodhisattva great beings should be isolated in a wilderness, a forest, or a remote place.”
- 45.17 “Blessed Lord, what else is the isolation of bodhisattva great beings if it is not the isolation of staying in a wilderness, a forest, or a remote place? Blessed Lord, in what way is the isolation of bodhisattva great beings different?”
- 45.18 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if bodhisattva great beings are isolated from the considerations of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, then they do not⁴⁷⁴ dwell in a wilderness, a forest, or a remote place. This, Subhūti, is the isolation that I have sanctioned for bodhisattva great beings. If they dwell day and night in accordance with this isolation, then indeed those bodhisattva great beings do dwell in isolation through the isolation of the bodhisattvas. [F.20.b] Even though bodhisattva great beings might dwell in a wilderness, a forest, or a remote place, if they dwell there tainted with the considerations of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, then those bodhisattva great beings do not dwell in isolation. Even though they dwell in towns, if bodhisattva great beings are untainted by the considerations of śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, then those bodhisattva great beings do dwell in isolation. Subhūti, if, distinct from the sort of isolation that I have sanctioned for bodhisattva great beings, they become tainted, then, as the evil Māra teaches isolation, saying, ‘You should dwell in a wilderness, a forest, or a remote place!’ they become disturbed and, stained by the considerations that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas possess, they do not persevere in the perfection of wisdom, and they will not perfect all-aspect omniscience. Since they dwell in that manner and their considerations are impure, they develop a mindset that scorns other bodhisattva great beings who dwell in towns, who are endowed with pure considerations, who are untainted by the mindset of the śrāvakas, untainted by the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas, [Ki.V: 9] and untainted by other negative mindsets apart from these, and who have perfected the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the absorptions in meditative stability, and the extrasensory powers.

45.19 “On the other hand, those bodhisattvas who are without skill in means, even though they may stay in a wilderness with snakes, wild ungulates, birds, thieves, outcastes, wild beasts with fangs, and frequented by cannibal ogres, more than a hundred yojanas in extent, and spend one year there, or one hundred years, one thousand years, one hundred thousand years, ten million years, one billion years, ten billion years, [F.21.a] one trillion years, one hundred billion trillion years, or even more than that, would not understand the sort of isolation through which bodhisattva great beings genuinely stay, keeping to their higher aspirations. Instead, they would dwell in contamination with the manifold modes of the considerations that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas possess. Simply because they are not genuinely intent on isolation, but are attached to it, cling to it, and are fixated on it, they will not please my mind. Since they lack that isolation that I have explained for the benefit of bodhisattva great beings, they do not stay in that isolation. If you ask why, it is because they are without that isolation.

45.20 “The evil Māra will approach such persons, standing in the air above, and say, ‘Excellent, noble child, excellent! This is the unerring isolation that the tathāgatas have revealed. You should dwell in accordance with this very isolation! Thereby you will swiftly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’ For this reason, they esteem this isolation rather than the [true] isolation, and on arriving back in town they deprecate other monks who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, whose minds and considerations are pure, and who certainly possess virtuous attributes, saying, 'Those venerables are engaging in social diversions!' And they develop a mindset that scorns bodhisattva great beings who engage in [genuine] isolation, accusing them of indulging in social diversions and accusing them of indulging in contamination. They hold that those who [actually] do indulge in social diversions are dwelling in accordance with isolation, and set out to serve them. However, they feel pride toward those whom they should actually set out to serve. If you ask why, [F.21.b] it is because they feel pride as they imagine, 'I am exhorted by nonhuman spirits. I am reminded by nonhuman spirits. This engagement through which I dwell is an unerring engagement. Who would consider and exhort townsfolk! Who would consider and remind townsfolk!'

45.21 "So it is that those bodhisattvas scorn other noble children who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. Subhūti, those individuals are known to be outcaste bodhisattvas. They are known to be critics of [genuine] bodhisattvas. They are known to be counterfeits of a bodhisattva. They are known to be thieves of the world, with its gods, humans, and asuras. That is to say, the world with its gods, humans, and asuras knows them to be thieves assuming the guise of a virtuous ascetic. Noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should not honor individuals of such disposition. They should not attend upon them. They should not serve them. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because such individuals are known to be extremely conceited. {Ki.V: 10}

45.22 "If bodhisattva great beings have not forsaken all-aspect omniscience, and if they have not forsaken unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, those bodhisattva great beings through their earnest aspiration will seek to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They will seek to act for the sake of all beings. They should not honor individuals of such [tainted] disposition. They should not attend upon them. They should not serve them. Rather, they should persevere to maintain their own purpose and they should always be disillusioned with cyclic existence. With an attitude of fear, they should dwell without being tainted by the three realms. Even toward those outcaste bodhisattvas they should develop loving kindness. Out of friendliness for them they should develop compassion, they should develop empathetic joy, and they should develop equanimity, [F.22.a] thinking, 'By whatever means I should act so that all these faults of mine will be entirely nonexistent in all respects, and they will not arise. And even if they do arise, I should train so that they will swiftly be abandoned.' Subhūti, one should know this as the effectiveness of the extrasensory power brought by bodhisattva great beings' own understanding.

- 45.23 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings of higher aspiration who seek to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should honor, attend upon, and serve spiritual mentors.”
- 45.24 “Blessed Lord, who are they who should be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings?”
- “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the lord buddhas should be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, śrāvakas who proclaim, teach, explain, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal the six perfections should also be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings.
- 45.25 “Moreover, Subhūti, the six perfections should be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings. The four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.22.b] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas should be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings. The real nature, the very limit of reality, and the realm of phenomena should be known as the spiritual mentors of bodhisattva great beings.
- 45.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, the six perfections should be known as the teachers of bodhisattva great beings. The six perfections constitute the path. The six perfections are the light. The six perfections are {Ki.V: 11} a lamp. They are intelligence, they are knowledge, and they are wisdom. The six perfections are an ally. The six perfections are a refuge. The six perfections are a lord-protector. The six perfections are a mother. The six perfections are a father.
- 45.27 “The four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas and knowledge of the path [F.23.a] should be known as the teachers of bodhisattva great beings. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] constitute the path. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] are the light. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] are a lamp. They are intelligence, they are knowledge, and they are wisdom. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] are an ally. Knowledge of the path [and the foregoing attributes] are a refuge. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] are a lord-protector. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] are a mother. Knowledge of the path [and so forth] are a father.

45.28 “All-aspect omniscience causes all reincarnation through the continuity of propensities to be abandoned. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because these thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment have also been the father and the mother of all lord buddhas, as many as have appeared as the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past. Subhūti, these thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment will also be the father and the mother of all lord buddhas, as many as will appear as the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the future. Subhūti, these thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are also the father and the mother of all lord buddhas, as many as are alive and residing at present in the world systems of the ten directions. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because it is from them that the lord buddhas of the past, the future, and the present have appeared, [will appear, and are appearing]. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who seek to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, who seek to refine the buddhafi elds, and who seek to bring beings to maturity should attract beings through the four attractive qualities of a bodhisattva. If you ask what are these four, they comprise generosity, pleasant speech, [F.23.b] purposeful activity, and harmony. Considering this state of affairs, Subhūti, I say that these thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are the teachers, mother, father, ally, refuge, and lord-protector of bodhisattva great beings. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who seek not to depend on others, who seek to continue not depending on others, who seek to cut off the doubts of all beings, who seek to refine the buddhafi elds, and who seek to bring beings to maturity should train in this very perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, it is in this perfection of wisdom that these attributes in which bodhisattva great beings should train are extensively revealed.”

45.29 Subhūti then asked, {Ki.V: 12} “Blessed Lord, what are the defining characteristics of the perfection of wisdom?”

The Blessed One replied, “Subhūti, like space, the perfection of wisdom has the defining characteristic of nonattachment. Subhūti, the defining characteristic of the perfection of wisdom is nonexistent. The perfection of wisdom has no defining characteristics at all.”

45.30 “Blessed Lord, might it be that all phenomena exist through that defining characteristic on the basis of which the perfection of wisdom exists?”

“Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “All phenomena exist through that defining characteristic on the basis of which the perfection of wisdom exists. If you ask why, Subhūti, all phenomena are naturally void. All phenomena are devoid of all phenomena. All phenomena are empty of all phenomena. For this reason, Subhūti, all phenomena exist through that defining characteristic on the basis of which the perfection of wisdom exists, [F.24.a] that is to say, owing to the defining characteristic of emptiness and the defining characteristic of voidness.”

45.31 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are void of all phenomena and if all phenomena are empty of all phenomena, how could there be affliction and purification of beings? Blessed Lord, voidness is neither afflicted nor purified. Emptiness is neither afflicted nor purified. Voidness and emptiness do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Voidness does not apprehend anything in emptiness, and if voidness does not apprehend any being in emptiness who would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, how then, Blessed Lord, should I understand the meaning of this teaching?”

45.32 “Subhūti, do you think that beings engage in notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine’ for a long time?” asked the Blessed One.

“Blessed Lord, they do! Sugata, they do! beings do engage for a long time in notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine.’ ”

45.33 “Subhūti, do you then think that notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine’ are void and empty?” asked the Blessed One.

“Blessed Lord, they are void! Sugata, they are empty!”

45.34 “Subhūti, do you then think that beings roam and wander in cyclic existence through notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine’?”

“Blessed Lord, it is so! Sugata, it is so! beings do roam and wander in cyclic existence through notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine.’ ”

45.35 The Blessed One [F.24.b] continued, “Subhūti, it is in that manner that there is the affliction of beings. When there are no notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine’ there is no grasping. When there is no grasping, beings do not roam and wander in cyclic existence; nothing at all is afflicted in it. {Ki.V: 13} Subhūti, it is in that manner that there is purification of beings.”

45.36 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner do not engage in physical forms. They do not engage in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not engage in the sense fields or the sensory elements. They do not engage in the links of dependent origination. They do not engage in the perfection of generosity.

They do not engage in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They do not engage in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they do not engage in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not engage in the applications of mindfulness. They do not engage in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They do not engage in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not engage in the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not engage in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. If one were to ask why, it is because nothing is apprehended, [F.25.a] including the phenomena that would be engaged in that manner, the phenomena through which they would engage, or the phenomena in which they would engage.

45.37 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who engage in that manner cannot be overcome by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner cannot be outshone by all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. If one were to ask why, it is because the status of the mature bodhisattvas is one that cannot be outshone, and so, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who never let up from focusing their attention on all-aspect omniscience cannot be outshone. Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner are approaching all-aspect omniscience.”

45.38 The Blessed One then asked, “Subhūti, if all the many beings of Jambudvīpa, in their entirety, were to acquire a human body and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and certain noble sons or noble daughters were, for the duration of their lives, to serve, respect, honor, and worship them, dedicating those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would greatly increase on that basis?”

“Blessed Lord, it would! Sugata, it would!”

45.39 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when noble sons or noble daughters {Ki.V: 14} teach, explain, establish, definitively establish, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal this perfection of wisdom to others, [F.25.b] and practice while directing their mind to the perfection of wisdom, their merit will increase even more than that!

45.40 “Subhūti, if all the many beings [of the world realms], up to and including the world system of the great trichiliocosm, in their entirety, were to acquire a human body and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and certain noble sons or noble daughters were, for the duration of their lives, to serve, respect, honor, and worship them, dedicating those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would greatly increase on that basis?”

“Blessed Lord, it would! Sugata, it would!”

45.41 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when noble sons or noble daughters teach, explain, establish, definitively establish, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal this perfection of wisdom to others, and practice while directing their mind to the perfection of wisdom, their merit will increase even more than that!

45.42 “Subhūti, if all the many beings of Jambudvīpa, in their entirety, were to acquire a human body and certain noble sons or noble daughters were to establish them in the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and establish them in the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the five extrasensory powers, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.26.a] dedicating those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would greatly increase on that basis?”

“Blessed Lord, it would! Sugata, it would!”

45.43 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when noble sons or noble daughters teach, explain, establish, definitively establish, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal this perfection of wisdom to others, their merit will increase even more than that!

45.44 “Subhūti, if all the many beings [of the world realms], up to and including the world system of the great trichiliocosm, in their entirety, were to acquire a human body, and certain noble sons or noble daughters were to establish them in the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and establish them in the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the five extrasensory powers, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment, and if they were to establish them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, dedicating those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, do you think, Subhūti, that the merit of those noble sons or noble daughters would greatly increase on that basis?"

"Blessed Lord, it would! Sugata, it would!"

45.45 "Subhūti," continued the Blessed One, "when noble sons or noble daughters teach, explain, establish, definitively establish, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal this perfection of wisdom to others, [F.26.b] their merit will increase even more than that!

45.46 "Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice in that manner and undertake this analysis while focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind become worthy recipients of the donations of all beings. If you ask why, it is because, with the exception of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, there is no being at all who has the sort of engagement that bodhisattva great beings undertake. If you ask why, it is because when those noble children practice the perfection of wisdom, they actualize great loving kindness. When they practice the perfection of wisdom, they observe that all beings are, as it were, about to be slaughtered and they acquire great compassion. Engaging with that practice, they rejoice and manifestly rejoice, actualizing great empathetic joy. Without getting involved with those distinguishing marks, they acquire great equanimity. This, Subhūti, is the supreme light of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings possess. Accordingly, it is the light of the perfection of generosity, and it is the light of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Even those noble children who have not yet attained all-aspect omniscience, consummate buddhahood, become worthy recipients of the donations of all beings, and they do not turn away from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

45.47 "Since they practice while focusing their attention with the perfection of wisdom in mind, {Ki.V: 15} they purify the donations of those patrons who give them clothing, alms, bedding, medicines, and [F.27.a] necessities, and they also approach all-aspect omniscience. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who seek to use the country's alms in a meaningful way, who seek to reveal the path to all beings, who seek to bring forth great luminosity, who seek to liberate beings imprisoned in the three realms, and who seek to develop the eye of unsurpassed wisdom in all beings should at all times and without interruption keep focusing their attention with the perfection of wisdom in mind. Even if bodhisattva great beings engage in focusing their attention with the perfection of wisdom in mind, they should give no opportunity for other mental activities to arise. By all means they should continue to persevere in focusing their attention with the perfection of wisdom in mind, without forsaking it, day and night.

45.48 “Subhūti, this is just as if a man who has not previously found a precious gem were to find a precious gem at a certain moment, and rejoice, delight, and be contented through finding that precious gem. But if immediately after finding that precious gem he were to lose it, because of that he would be sad and distressed. His attention would be constantly focused exclusively on that precious gem, at all times and without interruption, with the thought, ‘Alas! I have let go of that lovely precious gem!’ In the same way, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, considering it to be precious, should not part from focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind. They should not let go of that precious thing that is all-aspect omniscience, and in that way they will always have much happiness and contentment.” [F.27.b]

45.49 “Blessed Lord, if all such acts of attention are indeed without inherent existence—that is to say, if all acts of attention are indeed empty of inherent existence—how could bodhisattva great beings not part from focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind? In that parting, a bodhisattva is not apprehended, focusing of the attention is not apprehended, and all-aspect omniscience is not apprehended.”

45.50 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if bodhisattva great beings know that all phenomena are without inherent existence—that they have not been made by the śrāvakas, they have not been made by the pratyekabuddhas, and they have not even been made by the lord buddhas—but that this reality of all phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, the maturity with respect to all phenomena, {Ki.V: 16} the real nature, the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, the realm of phenomena, and the very limit of reality are established, then those bodhisattva great beings are not without the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the perfection of wisdom is devoid of inherent existence. It is empty of inherent existence. In it there is no increase and there is no decrease.”

45.51 “Blessed Lord, if the perfection of wisdom is devoid of inherent existence and it is empty of inherent existence, then, Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings genuinely bring forth the perfection of wisdom and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

45.52 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “even though bodhisattva great beings [F.28.a] genuinely bring forth the perfection of wisdom, it is without increase or decrease. The real nature is without increase or decrease. The realm of phenomena is without increase or decrease. The very limit of reality is without increase or decrease. If you ask why, it is because the perfection of wisdom is neither one nor two.

- 45.53 “Subhūti, great bodhisattvas who are not discouraged, cowed, afraid, terrified, or fearful when this is explained will dwell irreversibly in the expanse. One should know with certainty that these bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom.”
- 45.54 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, is it this [very] perfection of wisdom, which is emptiness, voidness, vacuity, hollowness, and essencelessness, that engages in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.55 “Blessed Lord, is there anything apprehensible apart from the perfection of wisdom that engages in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.56 “Blessed Lord, is it the perfection of wisdom that engages in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.57 “Blessed Lord, is it emptiness that engages in emptiness?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.58 “Blessed Lord, is it something other than emptiness that engages in emptiness?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. [F.28.b]
- 45.59 “Blessed Lord, is it physical forms that engage in the perfection of wisdom? Is it feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.V: 17}
- 45.60 “Blessed Lord, is it the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.61 “Blessed Lord, is it the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.62 “Blessed Lord, is it the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.
- 45.63 “Blessed Lord, is it [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”
- “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

45.64 “Blessed Lord, is it the emptiness of physical forms—their voidness, vacuity, hollowness, essencelessness, real nature, unmistaken real nature, one and only real nature, [F.29.a] reality, realm of phenomena, abiding nature of reality, maturity with respect to all phenomena, very limit of reality, and inconceivable realm—that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

45.65 “Blessed Lord, is it the emptiness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness—their voidness, vacuity, hollowness, essencelessness, real nature, unmistaken real nature, one and only real nature, reality, realm of phenomena, abiding nature of reality, maturity with respect to all phenomena, very limit of reality, and inconceivable realm—that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

45.66 “Blessed Lord, is it the emptiness of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination—their voidness, vacuity, hollowness, essencelessness, real nature, unmistaken real nature, one and only real nature, reality, realm of phenomena, abiding nature of reality, maturity with respect to all phenomena, very limit of reality, and inconceivable realm—that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

45.67 “Blessed Lord, is it the emptiness of the perfections, of all the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, [F.29.b] signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas {Ki.V: 18} and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience—their voidness, vacuity, hollowness, essencelessness, real nature, unmistaken real nature, one and only real nature, reality, realm of phenomena, abiding nature of reality, maturity with respect to all phenomena, very limit of reality, and inconceivable realm—that engage in the perfection of wisdom?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

45.68 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if these attributes do not engage in the perfection of wisdom, how then, Blessed Lord, do bodhisattva great beings engage in the perfection of wisdom?”

45.69 The Blessed One asked in return, “Subhūti, do you think that you can observe the way in which bodhisattva great beings engage in the perfection of wisdom?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

45.70 “Subhūti, do you think that anything can be apprehended that you cannot observe?” asked the Blessed One.

“No, Blessed Lord!”

45.71 “Subhūti, do you think that there is anything nonapprehensible that arises [F.30.a] or ceases?” asked the Blessed One.

“No, Blessed Lord!”

45.72 “This, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “is the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising, which bodhisattva great beings possess. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings endowed with such acceptance are prophesied by the lord buddhas to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. This, Subhūti, is said to be the paths of the ten powers, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. It is impossible that bodhisattva great beings who enter upon that path, practicing in that manner, striving in that manner, and endeavoring in that manner will not attain the wisdom of unsurpassed, completely awakened buddhahood—the supreme wisdom, the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, it is because those bodhisattva great beings have accepted that phenomena are nonarising. Those attributes that they have will never decrease until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

45.73 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, is it through this nonarising nature of all phenomena that bodhisattva great beings are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Subhūti!” {Ki.V: 19} replied the Blessed One.

45.74 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, is it neither through arising nor through nonarising that bodhisattva great beings are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. [F.30.b]

45.75 “Blessed Lord, if it is neither through arising, nor indeed through nonarising, that bodhisattva great beings are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, how then are bodhisattva great beings prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

45.76 The Blessed One asked in return, “Subhūti, do you think that you can observe such phenomena that are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Blessed Lord! I cannot, Blessed Lord, observe those phenomena that are prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Blessed Lord, I cannot observe anyone who will attain consummate buddhahood, anything through which consummate buddhahood will be attained, or even anything that will constitute consummate buddhahood.”

45.77 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings who do not apprehend anything do not think, ‘I will attain consummate buddhahood. Through this consummate buddhahood will be attained. This will constitute the attainment of consummate buddhahood.’ If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom are without all those conceptual thoughts. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual.”

45.78 This completes the forty-fifth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 46

- 46.1 Then, Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, said to the Blessed One, [F.31.a] “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom, owing to its extreme voidness, is profound; it is hard to see, hard to realize, inscrutable, not within the perceptual range of ideation, at peace, subtle, and delicate. It is to be realized through learning and awareness. Blessed Lord, those beings who hear, take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom, and are earnestly intent on the real nature, and who offer no opportunity for other phenomena, including mind and mental states, [to intrude] until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are not endowed with inferior roots of virtue.”
- 46.2 “Kauśika, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Those beings who hear, take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom, and are earnestly intent on the real nature, and who offer no opportunity for other phenomena, including mind and mental states, [to intrude] until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are not endowed with inferior roots of virtue. Kauśika, if all the beings of Jambudvīpa, as many as there are, {Ki.V: 20} were endowed with the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and endowed with the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, and the five extrasensory powers, and if there were a noble son or noble daughter who held, maintained, recite, and mastered this perfection of wisdom, and after holding, maintaining, reciting, and mastering it, were to be earnestly intent upon the real nature, in that case, Kauśika, the roots of virtuous action of the former would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of this root of virtue [of that son or noble daughter]. Nor would they be accepted as even a thousandth part, [F.31.b] a hundred thousandth part, a hundred billion trillionth part, or any number, fraction, categorization, comparison, or comparable quality!”

46.3 Thereupon, a certain monk said to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, “Kauśika, all those beings of Jambudvīpa who are endowed with the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and endowed with the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, and the five extrasensory powers, will be outshone by those noble sons or noble daughters who hold, maintain, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom, focusing their attention correctly on it, and who are earnestly intent on the real nature, offering no opportunity for other phenomena, including mind and mental states, [to intrude] until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

46.4 Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, replied to that monk, “If, O monk, all those beings of Jambudvīpa who are endowed with the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and endowed with the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, and the five extrasensory powers, will be outshone even by bodhisattva great beings who have given rise for the first time to the mind set on all-aspect omniscience, what more need one say about those who take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom, focusing their attention correctly on it, and who, even after taking up, upholding, reciting, and mastering it, are earnestly intent on the real nature. [F.32.a] They will outshine the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. That is to say, those bodhisattva great beings will come to outshine the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. Not only will those bodhisattva great beings come to outshine the world with its gods, humans, and asuras, those bodhisattva great beings will also come to outshine all those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, who have attained arhatship, and who have attained individual enlightenment. This will not only apply to those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, who are destined for only one more rebirth, who are no longer subject to rebirth, who have attained arhatship, and who have attained individual enlightenment. For those bodhisattva great beings will also come to outshine [other] bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of generosity without skill in means and without the perfection of wisdom. And this will apply not only to those who practice the perfection of generosity, {Ki.V: 21} for those bodhisattva great beings will also come to outshine bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of ethical discipline without skill in means and without the perfection of wisdom. And this will apply not only to those who practice the perfection of ethical discipline, for those bodhisattva great beings will also come to outshine all the many bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of tolerance without skill in means and without the perfection of wisdom. And this will apply not only to those who practice the perfection of tolerance, for those bodhisattva great beings will also come to outshine all the many bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of perseverance without skill in means and without the perfection of wisdom. [F.32.b] And this will apply not only to those who practice the perfection of perseverance, for those bodhisattva great beings will also come to outshine all the many bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of meditative concentration without skill in means and without the perfection of wisdom. And this will apply not only to those who practice the perfection of meditative concentration, for those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, as it has been revealed, cannot be outshone by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. Bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom practice in harmony with the perfection of wisdom, as it has been revealed. Those bodhisattva great beings are established so that the lineage of all-aspect omniscience will not be interrupted. Those bodhisattva great beings are not remote from the tathāgatas. Those bodhisattva great beings who enter in that manner will not be estranged from the site of enlightenment. Those bodhisattva great beings will wish to extricate beings immersed in the mire [of afflicted mental states]. Bodhisattva great beings who train in that manner undertake the training of the bodhisattvas. They do not undertake the training of the śrāvakas, and they do not undertake the training of the pratyekabuddhas.

- 46.5 “The Four Great Kings will also think of approaching bodhisattva great beings who train in that manner. Drawing near, they will say and point out, ‘Train swiftly, great one! Train nimbly, great one! You shall receive these four alms bowls when you are seated at the site of enlightenment, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.33.a] These have been received by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past.’ The Four Great Kings, along with the gods of Caturmahārājakāyika, will also think of approaching bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner. I, too, along with the gods of Trayastriṃśa, will think of approaching them. Suyāma, king of the gods, along with the gods of Yāma, will also think of approaching them. Saṃtuṣita, king of the gods, along with the gods of Tuṣita, will also think of approaching them. Sunirmita, king of the gods, along with the gods of Nirmāṇarata, will also think of approaching them. Vaśavartin, king of the gods, along with the gods of Paranirmitavaśavartin, will also think of approaching them. Brahmā Sahāṃpati, accompanied by the gods of Brahmakāyika, will also think of approaching them. {Ki.V: 22} The gods of the Ābhāsvara⁴⁷⁵ realms will also think of approaching them. The gods of Śubhakarṣna, Bṛhatphala, Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛṣa, Sudarśana, and the Pure Abode [of Akaniṣṭha] will also think of approaching them.

46.6 “The tathāgatas will always direct their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom. The bodies of those bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom accordingly will be entirely and in all respects unafflicted by all the many other worldly sufferings that might afflict them. O monk, such will be the manifest attributes of this life when bodhisattva great beings practice this profound perfection of wisdom. [F.33.b] All the combined humoral disorders, as many as there are, including eye diseases, ear diseases, nose diseases, tongue diseases, body diseases, or heart diseases will not arise and will not afflict their bodies. One should know that these are the attributes of this life when bodhisattva great beings practice the profound perfection of wisdom.”

46.7 Then the venerable Ānanda thought, “Does this Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, teach the perfection of wisdom and eloquently declare the attributes of the perfection of wisdom through his own inspired speech, or does he teach through the power of the buddhas?”

46.8 Thereupon, Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, understood with his own mind the thoughts in the mind of the venerable Ānanda, and said to the venerable Ānanda, “Venerable Ānanda, you should know that it is by the power of the buddhas that I teach the perfection of wisdom in that manner and eloquently declare the attributes of the perfection of wisdom.”

46.9 Then the Blessed One said to the venerable Ānanda, “Ānanda, it is so! It is so. It is by the power of the buddhas that Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, teaches this perfection of wisdom and eloquently declares the attributes of the perfection of wisdom. This is the blessing of the tathāgatas. Ānanda, when bodhisattva great beings train in the perfection of wisdom, persevere in the perfection of wisdom, and cultivate the perfection of wisdom, all the forces of evil Māra in the world system of the great trichiliocosm, as many as there are, will have their doubts, wondering whether these bodhisattva great beings {Ki.V: 23} will actualize the very limit of reality [F.34.a] and attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment, or if not, will they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

46.10 “Moreover, Ānanda, at the time when bodhisattva great beings do not lack the perfection of wisdom, the evil Māra will be pierced by the pains of sorrow. Also, Ānanda, at the time when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, the evil Māra will by all means cause meteors to fall and arouse fear, so that at least a single thought of these bodhisattva great beings might be disturbed from their attention to all-aspect omniscience, that they might be discouraged, and that their hairs might stand on end.”

46.11 Then the venerable Ānanda asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, does the evil Māra approach all bodhisattva great beings with the intention of harming them?”

“Ānanda, the evil Māra does not approach all bodhisattva great beings with the intention of harming them,” replied the Blessed One.

46.12 “In that case, Blessed Lord, what sort of [bodhisattvas] does he approach?” asked Ānanda.

“Ānanda,” replied the Blessed One, “with the intention of harming, the evil forces of Māra approach those bodhisattva great beings who were formerly disinterested when this profound perfection of wisdom was being taught. Moreover, Ānanda, [F.34.b] the evil forces of Māra approach with the intention of harming those bodhisattvas who were hesitant when this profound perfection of wisdom was being taught, wondering whether this was or was not the perfection of wisdom.”

46.13 “Moreover, Ānanda, if bodhisattvas are without a spiritual mentor, the evil forces of Māra will find an opportunity to intrude upon those bodhisattvas who have not heard this profound perfection of wisdom because they have not seen a spiritual mentor, who do not understand it because they have not heard it, and who are not earnestly intent on the real nature because they do not understand how it should be cultivated. {Ki.V: 24}

46.14 “Moreover, Ānanda, if bodhisattvas who are without the perfection of wisdom speak in praise of that which is not the Dharma, then the evil Māra will think, ‘Those who speak in praise of that which is not the Dharma are my friends. The friends I have found among the many followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas are those who speak in praise of that which is not the Dharma. Such persons who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will come to dwell in one or the other of two levels—the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas—and they will fulfill my intention.’ Ānanda, the evil Māra will indeed find an opportunity to intrude upon those bodhisattvas.

46.15 “Moreover, Ānanda, if you ask what sort [of bodhisattvas] the evil Māra might find an opportunity to intrude upon, at the time when this profound perfection of wisdom is being taught, if there are bodhisattva great beings who say, ‘The perfection of wisdom is most profound. What would be the point of you listening to this profound perfection of wisdom? [F.35.a] What would be the point of you cultivating, taking up, upholding, and even mastering it? Since even I did not reach its depths, how could you possibly do so!’ in that case, Ānanda, the evil Māra will indeed find an opportunity to intrude upon those bodhisattvas.

46.16 “Moreover, Ānanda, when bodhisattva great beings scorn other bodhisattvas and give rise to conceits, saying, ‘I am practicing the perfection of generosity. I am practicing the perfections of ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom. You do not practice the perfection of generosity. You do not practice the perfections of ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom,’ in that case, Ānanda, the evil Māra will indeed find an opportunity to intrude upon those bodhisattvas.

46.17 “Moreover, Ānanda, when bodhisattva great beings give rise to the conceit that they themselves are best, at that time, Ānanda, the evil Māra will rejoice, and he will be delighted, contented, jubilant, satisfied, and happy. In that case, Ānanda, the evil Māra will indeed find an opportunity to intrude upon those bodhisattvas.

46.18 “Moreover, Ānanda, when bodhisattva great beings become famous by proclaiming their name or their clan, on the basis of proclaiming that name or that clan, they might despise other bodhisattva great beings who are endowed with the attributes of virtuous actions. Praising themselves and disparaging others, they indeed lack those aspects, marks, and signs that irreversible bodhisattva great beings have, {Ki.V: 25} and in the absence of those aspects, marks, and signs, they develop afflicted mental states, praising themselves and disparaging others with the words, ‘You do not seem to be established in the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and [F.35.b] you do not seem to be established in the family of the bodhisattvas in the way in which I appear to be established in the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and the family of the bodhisattvas.’ If in that manner they defame and disparage individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, the evil Māra will think, ‘My realm will not be deserted! beings will absolutely multiply in the great hells, the animal realm, the world of Yama, and the domain of anguished spirits.’ By all means the evil Māra will influence those bodhisattvas so their words will become plausible. Since their words are plausible, many people will also think that they should be heeded and trusted, and they will act in conformity with that which they have heard or seen. That is to say, they will act in conformity with what they have heard or seen, and they will train in that manner. When they train in that manner, earnestly intent on the real nature, their afflicted mental states will absolutely multiply. Whatever actions of body, speech, and mind they may undertake with their erroneous intention will all become undesirable, disagreeable, and unpleasant. In that way the denizens of the great hells will absolutely multiply. The animal realm, the world of Yama, and the domain of anguished spirits will also greatly multiply. Even the realm of Māra will absolutely multiply. In consideration of this, Ānanda, the evil Māra will rejoice, and he will be delighted, satisfied, and happy.

46.19 “Moreover, Ānanda, if individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas dispute with individual followers of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, saying, ‘I am the best. You are not!’ then the evil Māra will think, ‘Oh! This noble child is far from all-aspect omniscience. [F.36.a] He is not approaching all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, these conflicts, fights, disputes, and accusations are not the path of all-aspect omniscience. They are the path of the denizens of the hells. They are the path of the animal realm. They are the path of the world of Yama. They are not the path of all-aspect omniscience.’

46.20 “Moreover, Ānanda, if an individual follower of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas engages in conflicts, disputes, fights, and accusations with another individual who follows the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, in that case, the evil Māra will think, ‘Both of these are far from all-aspect omniscience. Both of these will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, on whatever path these two noble children have set out, it is not the path of all-aspect omniscience. These two noble children have set out on the path of the denizens of the hells, the animal realm, and the world of Yama.’ Then he will rejoice, and he will be delighted, satisfied, and happy.

46.21 “Moreover, Ānanda, when bodhisattvas who have not been prophesied think maliciously of bodhisattvas who have been prophesied, and engage in conflicts, disputes, {Ki.V: 26} fights, and accusations, if they have not abandoned all-aspect omniscience, they must don the armor for as many eons as the negative thoughts that have arisen and the conflicts, disputes, fights, and accusations in which they have engaged.”

46.22 “Blessed Lord, is there any other emancipation for those in whom negative thoughts have arisen, or if not, will they absolutely have to don the armor for that number of eons?” asked Ānanda.

46.23 “Ānanda,” replied the Blessed One, “I have revealed the Dharma with its emancipation to individual followers of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, followers of the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. [F.36.b] In this regard, Ānanda, when individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas engage in conflict, dispute, scolding, and defamation with [other] individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and after having engaged in conflict, dispute, scolding, and defamation, they do not make a confession but retain that malice and maintain that hostility, then, Ānanda, I do not speak of emancipation. If those individuals have not abandoned all-aspect omniscience, they must undoubtedly don the armor for that number of eons. Ānanda, even though bodhisattva great beings may have engaged in conflict, dispute, scolding, and defamation, if they do not retain that malice, and thenceforth maintain their vows, thinking, ‘I should have gained but I have lost. When I should have eliminated the sufferings of all beings, I spoke and responded in that manner. When I should have acted as a bridge for all beings, I have defamed others in that manner and contradicted them. I should not have acted in that inappropriate manner! I should have acted as if I was slow-witted and dumb. I should be without agitation in my thoughts. Since I must bring these beings to final nirvāṇa, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, it is not appropriate that I should be ill-disposed toward them and fight with them. I will not think maliciously of them. I will not fight with them!’ in that case, Ānanda, I have explained that those bodhisattva great beings will be emancipated. In that case, the evil Māra, even though he should look for and search for an opportunity to intrude, will find no such opportunity.

46.24 “Moreover, Ānanda, bodhisattva great beings should not befriend individuals who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas. They should not stay with them. They should not sit with them. [F.37.a] But even if they do, they should not think maliciously of anyone at all. They should not be angered. If you ask why, it is inappropriate for them {Ki.V: 27} to think maliciously of such people or to be angered. If you ask why, it is because they should think, ‘After attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I must liberate them from all sufferings.’ [B55]

46.25 “Blessed Lord, how should bodhisattva great beings treat individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas?” asked Ānanda.

46.26 “Ānanda,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should treat individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas just as they treat the Teacher. If you ask why, they set their minds, thinking, ‘These are my friends—we have embarked on the same ship. I should also train in the same manner in which they are training. I should also train in the same phenomena in which they should train—the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, all the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, [F.37.b] great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’ In addition, they should set their minds on the thought, ‘They are teaching the path of complete enlightenment, but if they behave in a corrupt manner, and are not focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind, I should not train in that manner. If those bodhisattva great beings never stop focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind, I too should train accordingly.’ Bodhisattva great beings who train in that manner train in sameness.”

46.27 This completes the forty-sixth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 47

47.1 Thereupon, the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, what is the sameness of the bodhisattva great beings—the sameness in which bodhisattva great beings should train?”

47.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the emptiness of internal phenomena constitutes the sameness of bodhisattva great beings. The emptiness of external phenomena constitutes the sameness of bodhisattva great beings. The emptiness of external and internal phenomena constitutes the sameness of bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, constitute the sameness of bodhisattva great beings. Physical forms are empty of physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty of consciousness [and so forth]. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The perfections, [F.38.a] all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment are empty of the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. [Ki.V: 28] The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, and the serial steps of meditative absorption are empty of the serial steps of meditative absorption [and so forth]. Emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. All these, Subhūti, constitute the sameness of bodhisattva great beings. Abiding in it, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

47.3 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings undertake training in order that physical forms may be terminated, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order to become detached from physical forms, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that physical forms may cease, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that physical forms may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness may be terminated, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order to become detached from consciousness [and so forth], do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that consciousness [and so forth] may cease, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? [F.38.b] When they undertake training in order that consciousness [and so forth] may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination may be terminated, in order to become detached from them, in order that they may cease, and in order that they may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas may be terminated, in order to become detached from them, in order that they may cease, and in order that they may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, may be terminated, in order to become detached from them, in order that they may cease and in order that they may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience?”

47.4 “No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. “The elder Subhūti has asked, ‘When they undertake training in order that physical forms may be terminated, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order to become detached from physical forms, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that physical forms may cease, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? [F.39.a] When they undertake training in order that physical forms may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness may be terminated, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order to become detached from consciousness [and so forth], do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that consciousness [and so forth] may cease, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that consciousness [and so forth] may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination may be terminated, in order to become detached from them, {Ki.V: 29} in order that they may cease, and in order that they may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas may be terminated, in order to become detached from them, in order that they may cease, and in order that they may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience? When they undertake training in order that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, may be terminated, in order to become detached from them, in order that they may cease, and in order that they may not arise, do they train in all-aspect omniscience?’ That is not the case!

47.5 “Subhūti, do you think that the real nature of physical forms; [F.39.b] the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; the real nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; the real nature of the perfections; the real nature of all the aspects of emptiness; the real nature of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; the real nature of the truths of the noble ones; the real nature of the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions; the real nature of the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness; the real nature of the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; the real nature of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, can be terminated, abandoned, or arise or cease?”

“No, Blessed Lord! No, Sugata!”

47.6 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “those bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in the real nature, and they do train in all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in six perfections, and they do train in all-aspect omniscience. They train in all the aspects of emptiness, they train in the four applications of mindfulness, [F.40.a] and they train in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They train in the truths of the noble ones. They train in the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They train in the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They train in the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They train in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, {Ki.V: 30} and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They train in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

47.7 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly will attain the perfection of all trainings. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly cannot succumb to Māra, or to the gods within the realm of Māra. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly will swiftly attain the level at which progress has become irreversible. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly will experience the perceptual range of their respective tathāgatas. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in the protective Dharma. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in great loving kindness and great compassion. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to refine the buddhafiels. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to bring beings to maturity.

47.8 “Subhūti, [F.40.b] bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to turn the wheel of the Dharma in three times and twelve ways.⁴⁷⁶ Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to bring all beings to maturity. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to ensure that the lineage of the tathāgatas will not be interrupted. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to open the portals of immortality. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly train in order to reveal the unconditioned elements.

47.9 “Subhūti, inferior beings cannot undertake this training, but bodhisattva great beings who would undertake training do train in it, wishing to extricate all beings from cyclic existence. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly will not be born among the denizens of the hells. They will not be born in the animal realm, or in the world of Yama. They will not be born in frontier regions or precipitous gorges. They will not be born among refuse scavengers, or among outcastes. They will not be blind, hunchbacked, crippled, or mutilated. They will not be deaf. They will not be armless. They will not be without the sense faculties. Their sense faculties will be intact. Their sense faculties will not be deficient. They will not kill living creatures. They will not steal. They will not commit sexual misconduct. They will not tell lies. They will not slander, or indulge in verbal abuse or irresponsible chatter. They will not have thoughts of covetousness or malice. They will not resort to mistaken views. They will not sustain themselves through wrong livelihood. They will not acquire anything that is inauthentic. [F.41.a] They will not resort to degenerate morality. They will not acquire degenerate morality. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly will not be born among the long-lived gods.⁴⁷⁷

47.10 “If you ask why, {Ki.V: 31} they are endowed with skill in means, so that such bodhisattva great beings possess the skill in means through which they will not be born among the long-lived gods. If you ask why, it is because skill in means is revealed in this very perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings who possess skill in means will also become absorbed in the meditative concentrations. They will also become absorbed in the immeasurable attitudes. They will also become absorbed in the formless absorptions, but they will not take rebirth [in the realms of form and formlessness] due to the influences of these meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, and formless absorptions.

47.11 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train accordingly will purify the stains of directing their minds to the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and so they will acquire refinement of the powers associated with all the attributes of the buddhas.”

47.12 “Blessed Lord, inasmuch as all phenomena are naturally pure, what are the attributes of the bodhisattva great beings through which this refinement is acquired?”

47.13 “It is so, Subhūti! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is just as you have said. Subhūti, all phenomena are naturally pure. Subhūti, inasmuch as all phenomena are naturally pure, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, it is their absence of discouragement and absence of intimidation, Subhūti, that constitutes the perfection of wisdom. Since all simple, ordinary people do not know and do not discern this reality, for the sake of these beings, [F.41.b] bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity, and they practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They practice the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they practice [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They practice the applications of mindfulness, and they practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They practice the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They practice the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They practice the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

47.14 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly acquire the powers and fearlessnesses [of the buddhas] with respect to all phenomena, and they will not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly will transcend the thoughts, activities, and distractions of all beings.

47.15 “Subhūti, just as there are few places on earth where the pure gold of the Jambu River is found, in the same way, Subhūti, those beings who have undertaken this training of the perfection of wisdom are few in number. Those beings who become established in the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas are much more numerous. [F.42.a]

47.16 “Subhūti, just as there are few beings who have undertaken and maintained actions commensurate with an imperial monarch, {Ki.V: 32} while those beings who have undertaken and maintained actions commensurate with a regional king are much more numerous, in the same way, Subhūti, those beings who have entered upon this path that leads to all-aspect omniscience are few in number, whereas the beings who become established on the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas are much more numerous.

47.17 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are earnestly intent on the real nature are far fewer than those bodhisattva great beings who have set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Even more numerous than them are those beings who become established on the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas.

47.18 “Subhūti, those who master the reversible levels are much more numerous than the noble children who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas and who practice, without hesitation, this profound perfection of wisdom and master the level at which progress has become irreversible. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain the level at which progress has become irreversible and who wish to enter into the level at which progress has become irreversible should train in this profound perfection of wisdom.

47.19 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice this profound perfection of wisdom, thoughts associated with miserliness do not arise. Thoughts associated with degenerate morality do not arise. Thoughts associated with indolence do not arise. Thoughts associated with distraction do not arise. Thoughts associated with stupidity do not arise. Thoughts associated with desire do not arise. [F.42.b] Thoughts associated with hatred do not arise. Thoughts associated with delusion do not arise. Thoughts associated with obstinacy do not arise.

47.20 “Thoughts associated with physical forms do not arise. Thoughts associated with feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness do not arise. Thoughts associated with the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination do not arise. Thoughts associated with the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment do not arise. Thoughts associated with the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways do not arise. Thoughts associated with the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas do not arise. Thoughts associated with [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do not arise. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because when bodhisattva great beings practice this profound perfection of wisdom, they do not apprehend anything at all. Since they are without apprehending, they do not set their minds on anything at all. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who have trained in this profound perfection of wisdom will have acquired all the perfections. They will have procured all the perfections. They will have acted in harmony with all the perfections. {Ki.V: 33} If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because all the perfections are subsumed in this profound perfection of wisdom.

47.21 “Subhūti, just as sixty-two sorts of view are subsumed within the view of mundane constructs, in the same way, Subhūti, [F.43.a] all the perfections are subsumed in this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, just as when the faculty of the life force has ceased at the time of a person’s death, all the sense faculties will cease, in the same way, Subhūti, all the other five perfections are subsumed by those who practice this profound perfection of wisdom. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to transcend all the perfections should train in this profound perfection of wisdom.

47.22 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in this profound perfection of wisdom train in that which is exalted among all beings, Subhūti, do you think that the beings inhabiting this world system of the great trichiliocosm are many?”

“Blessed Lord, they are many! Sugata, they are many! Blessed Lord, if the beings of Jambudvīpa are indeed many, what need one say about the beings in this world system of the great trichiliocosm!”

47.23 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “if all the beings in this world system of the great trichiliocosm, as many as there are, throughout time had acquired a human body, and all of them had then attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and if there were a [single] bodhisattva great being who had honored each one of all those tathāgatas with robes, alms, bedding, medicines for the treatment of ailments, and many [other] resources for the duration of their lives, without interruption, Subhūti, do you think that the merit of that bodhisattva great being would, on that basis, increase more greatly?” [F.43.b]

“Blessed Lord, it would be great! Sugata, it would be great!”

47.24 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when a noble son or noble daughter takes up, upholds, recites, masters, and focuses attention correctly on this profound perfection of wisdom, and is earnestly intent on the real nature, his or her merit would increase much more than these [aforementioned merits]. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have will be of great benefit—it will bring about the attainment of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

47.25 “Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to become unsurpassed among all beings, who wish to become a protector to all those beings who are unprotected, who wish to become a refuge to those who are without a refuge, who wish to become a sanctuary for those who are without sanctuary, {Ki.V: 34} who wish to become an eye for the blind, who wish to become a lamp for those immersed in darkness, who wish to attain completely awakened buddhahood, who wish to comprehend the perceptual range of the buddhas, who wish to frolic through the emanational play of the buddhas, who wish to roar the lion’s roar of the buddhas, who wish to beat the great drum of the buddhas, who wish to blow the conch of the buddhas, who wish to enunciate the sermons of the buddhas—all of these should train in this profound perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, among those attainments of excellence, there is nothing at all that bodhisattva great beings who train in the perfection of wisdom will not attain.”

47.26 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, will they also attain the excellence of the śrāvakas? Will they also attain the excellence of the pratyekabuddhas?” [F.44.a] “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “they will indeed attain the excellence of the śrāvakas and they will also attain the excellence of the pratyekabuddhas, but they should not dwell in those [two modes of excellence]. They should not remain fixed in them. They should perceive them with knowledge and [genuine] view. That is to say, they should transcend them, and enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity.

47.27 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in this manner will approach all-aspect omniscience. They will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in this manner become worthy recipients of the donations in the world, with its gods, humans, and asuras. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in this manner outshine all other worthy recipients of worldly donations apart from them—śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas—and they will approach all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in this manner do not forsake the perfection of wisdom, and they practice the perfection of wisdom. That is to say, they are not bereft of the perfection of wisdom.

47.28 “Subhūti, one should know that the bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom in this manner possess the attribute of not degenerating from all-aspect omniscience. They give the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas a wide berth, and approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

47.29 “If indeed they were to think, ‘This is the perfection of wisdom! The perfection of wisdom is present here! Through this perfection of wisdom I will attain all-aspect omniscience!’ when they know in that way, they do not practice the perfection of wisdom. [F.44.b] If, on the other hand, they do not know, ‘This is the perfection of wisdom! The perfection of wisdom is present here!’ in that case they neither know nor perceive anyone who possesses the perfection of wisdom, anything that would bring about the perfection of wisdom, {Ki.V: 35} or anyone who would be emancipated through the perfection of wisdom and attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. And if they then think, ‘Since the realm of phenomena, the real nature, and the very limit of reality are fixed states, they are not the perfection of wisdom! The perfection of wisdom is not contained in it! There is nothing at all that will be emancipated through this perfection of wisdom!’ then indeed, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly do practice the perfection of wisdom.”

47.30 This completes the forty-seventh chapter from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

- 48.1 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, thought, “If bodhisattva great beings outshine all beings while just practicing the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, the emptiness of internal phenomena, [all the other aspects of emptiness] up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, [F.45.a] signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, what need one say when they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! If even those beings whose minds are just introduced to all-aspect omniscience excellently acquire the attainments, and if even those beings sustain themselves excellently through their livelihoods, what need one say about those who have set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! Those beings who have set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and listen to this perfection of wisdom are to be emulated by all.”
- 48.2 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, took many coral tree flowers, and, going into the presence of the Blessed One, scattered those coral flowers, scattered them more vigorously, and scattered them with utmost vigor toward the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha, saying, “By this root of virtue may those individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, with their focus intent on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, perfect the attributes of the buddhas! May they all perfect the attributes of all-aspect omniscience! May they perfect the attributes that naturally arise, and may they perfect the attributes that are free from contaminants!

48.3 “Blessed Lord, I do not in the slightest think that individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will regress, [F.45.b] having set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Blessed Lord, I do not in the slightest think that these bodhisattva great beings will regress and become śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas. On the contrary, they will long for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, {Ki.V: 36} and they will aspire again and again toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Seeing the many sufferings of cyclic existence, they will resolve to benefit the whole world, with its gods, humans, and asuras; they will resolve to alleviate [its sufferings], to make them happy and secure. Bodhisattva great beings who have such a mindset will think, ‘Whatever happens, once I have crossed [beyond cyclic existence], I must save those beings who have not yet crossed beyond it! Whatever happens, once I have been liberated, I must liberate those beings who have not yet been liberated! Whatever happens, once I have been inspired, I must inspire those beings who have not yet been inspired! Whatever happens, once I have attained final nirvāṇa, I must bring to final nirvāṇa those beings who have not attained final nirvāṇa!’

48.4 “Blessed Lord, how much merit will noble sons or noble daughters accrue when they rejoice in those mindsets of bodhisattva great beings who are novices entering the vehicle in that manner, when they rejoice in those mindsets of bodhisattva great beings who have been practicing for a long time, when they rejoice in those mindsets of irreversible bodhisattva great beings, and when they rejoice in those mindsets of bodhisattva great beings who are destined for only one more rebirth?” [F.46.a]

48.5 The Blessed One then replied to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, “Kauśika, you may even be able to measure in units of the tip of a hair this world system of the four continents, but you cannot measure the merits of those who set their mind on enlightenment while they are rejoicing. Kauśika, you may even be able to measure in units of the tip of a hair the world systems of a chiliocosm, the world systems of a dichiliocosm, and the world systems of a great trichiliocosm, but you cannot measure the merits of those who set their mind on enlightenment while they are rejoicing. Kauśika, you may even be able to measure in units of one hundredth of the tip of a hair all the mass of water in the oceans of this world system of the great trichiliocosm, taking out the water drop by drop, but you cannot measure the merits of those who set their minds on enlightenment while they are rejoicing.”

48.6 Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, then said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, beings who would not rejoice in those who have set their mind on enlightenment are influenced by Māra. Blessed Lord, beings who would not rejoice in those who have set their mind on enlightenment are on the side of Māra. Blessed Lord, beings who would not rejoice in those who have set their mind on enlightenment have been reborn here after dying in the domain of Māra. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because beings who have achieved this setting of the mind on enlightenment and dedicated [the merit] toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment destroy the domain of Māra. One should rejoice in beings who have set their mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [F.46.b] Any who do not forsake the Buddha, who do not forsake the Dharma, and who do not forsake the Saṅgha should rejoice in those who have set their mind on enlightenment. Then, having rejoiced, {Ki.V: 37} they should dedicate [the merit] to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. This dedication should be made in such a way that there is no notion of duality and no notion of nonduality.”

48.7 “Kauśika, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is just as you have said. Kauśika, rejoicing in those who have set their mind on enlightenment, they will swiftly come to please the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, and having once pleased them they will not displease them. Those endowed with the roots of virtuous action, setting their mind on enlightenment combined with rejoicing, will be served, respected, honored, and worshiped, wherever they are reborn. They will never again perceive unpleasant sights. They will never hear unpleasant sounds. They will never smell unpleasant odors. They will never savor unpleasant tastes. They will never touch unpleasant tangible objects. They will never be conscious of unpleasant mental phenomena. They will never be without the buddhas. They will move from buddhafiield to buddhafiield, and they will venerate the lord buddhas. They will develop the roots of virtuous action. If you ask why, Kauśika, it is because those noble sons or noble daughters have rejoiced in the roots of virtuous action acquired by inestimable and immeasurable bodhisattva great beings, including novices entering the vehicle, those who are engaged in practice, [F.47.a] those who are irreversible, and those who are destined for only one more rebirth. Enhanced by those roots of virtuous action, they will approach unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they will bring inestimable, countless, measureless beings to final nirvāṇa.

48.8 “For that reason, Kauśika, noble sons or noble daughters should by all means rejoice in the roots of virtuous action, possessed by bodhisattva great beings who are novices entering the vehicle, and they should then dedicate this [merit] toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, doing so free of a mindset and free of anything else other than a mindset.⁴⁷⁸ They should rejoice in those roots of virtuous action [possessed by bodhisattva great beings] who are engaged in practice, who are irreversible, and who are destined for only one more rebirth, and then they should dedicate that [merit] toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, doing so free of a mind and free of anything else other than a mind.”⁴⁷⁹ {Ki.V: 44}

48.9 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how does the illusion-like mind attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

48.10 “Subhūti, do you think that you can observe the illusion-like mind?” asked the Blessed One in return.

“No, Blessed Lord! Blessed Lord, I do not observe illusion, nor indeed do I observe illusion-like mind.” {Ki.V: 45}

48.11 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, [F.47.b] “if you cannot even perceive illusion or illusion-like mind, do you think that you can observe that mind that would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

48.12 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “do you think that you can observe anything other than illusion or illusion-like mind that would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Blessed Lord, I do not observe anything other than illusion or illusion-like mind that would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

48.13 “Blessed Lord, since I do not observe anything extraneous, I should disclose [the nature of] phenomena in terms of being existent or nonexistent: Anything that is absolutely void is neither existent nor nonexistent. Anything that is absolutely void will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Indeed, anything that is nonexistent will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because this applies to all phenomena, defiled or purified, which are nonexistent and utterly nonexistent.

48.14 “If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because the perfection of wisdom is absolutely void. The perfection of meditative concentration is absolutely void. The perfection of perseverance is absolutely void. The perfection of tolerance is absolutely void. The perfection of ethical discipline [F.48.a] is absolutely void. The perfection of generosity is absolutely void. The emptiness of internal phenomena is absolutely void. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are absolutely void. The applications of mindfulness are absolutely void. The correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are absolutely void. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions are absolutely void. The aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness are absolutely void. The extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are absolutely void. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are absolutely void. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely void. There is nothing at all that is absolutely void that is to be cultivated, and nothing that is to be uncultivated. Since the perfection of wisdom is absolutely void, there is nothing at all that is to be attained. Since the perfection of wisdom is absolutely void, how will bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, dependent on the perfection of wisdom? Since unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, too, is absolutely void, how can voidness attain buddhahood through voidness?" [F.48.b]

48.15 "Excellent, Subhūti, excellent!" replied the Blessed One. {Ki.V: 46} "Subhūti, it is so! It is so. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is absolutely void. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are absolutely void. The emptiness of internal phenomena is absolutely void. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are absolutely void. The applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are absolutely void. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions are absolutely void. The aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness are absolutely void. The extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are absolutely void. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely void.

48.16 "Subhūti, just as the perfection of wisdom is absolutely void, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are absolutely void; the emptiness of internal phenomena is absolutely [F.49.a] void; [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are absolutely void; the applications of mindfulness are absolutely void; [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, are absolutely void; [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely void; and so, too, the attainment of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is absolutely void.

48.17 “Subhūti, if the perfection of wisdom were not absolutely void; if the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity were not absolutely void; if the emptiness of internal phenomena were not absolutely void; if [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, were not absolutely void; if the applications of mindfulness were not absolutely void; if [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, were not absolutely void; and if [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, were not absolutely void, then there would be no perfection of wisdom; there would be no perfection of meditative concentration, perfection of perseverance, perfection of tolerance, perfection of ethical discipline, or perfection of generosity; there would be no emptiness of internal phenomena; there would be no [other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; there would be no applications of mindfulness; there would be no [other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path; and there would be no [fruitional attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Therefore, Subhūti, inasmuch as the perfection of wisdom is absolutely void; inasmuch as the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are absolutely void; [F.49.b] inasmuch as the emptiness of internal phenomena is absolutely void, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities are absolutely void; inasmuch as the applications of mindfulness are absolutely void, and [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path, are absolutely void; and inasmuch as [the fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely void, [bodhisattva great beings] will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment dependent on the perfection of wisdom. How can voidness attain buddhahood through voidness? Since there will be no attainment of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment dependent on the perfection of wisdom.” {Ki.V: 48}

48.18 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings practice with a profound objective.”

“Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings do practice with a profound objective. That is to say, in not actualizing the objective of resorting to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, they do that which is difficult.”

48.19 “Blessed Lord, as I understand the meaning spoken by the Blessed One, if they do not incur the slightest difficulty, how do bodhisattva great beings do what is difficult? If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because they do not apprehend any objective that they should realize whatsoever. Nor do they apprehend the perfection of wisdom through which [their objective] would be realized. Nor do they apprehend anything that would bring about that realization. Blessed Lord, they engage in nonapprehension with respect to all phenomena that can be realized—whatever, Blessed Lord, may be the objective to be realized, such as the attainment of consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.50.a] whatever the perfection of wisdom through which it is to be realized, or whatever may be the attributes that realize it. Bodhisattva great beings who practice this acquire a state that is without blindness with respect to all phenomena. Blessed Lord, if, when this is taught, the minds of bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, not utterly cowed, not afraid, and not terrified, in that case, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly do practice the perfection of wisdom. They do not observe that which they are practicing. They do not observe the perfection of wisdom. They do not observe that they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

48.20 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom do not think, ‘I should shun the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. I am approaching all-aspect omniscience.’ Blessed Lord, space does not think, ‘I am remote from some and near to others.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because space is not particularized; it is immobile and nonconceptual. In the same way, Blessed Lord, though bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not think, ‘The level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas is remote from me. Unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is near.’ If one were to ask why, [F.50.b] Blessed Lord, it is because the perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual. {Ki.V: 49}

- 48.21 “Blessed Lord, it is just as an illusory man does not think, ‘This illusion is remote from me. The illusionist is near. The crowd of people gathered here are remote from me or near.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because an illusory man is without concepts. In the same way, Blessed Lord, though bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not think, ‘The level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas is remote from me. Unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is near.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because the perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual.
- 48.22 “Blessed Lord, it is just as a reflection does not think, ‘This apprehending of the reflection that arises is near to me. The mirror or the vessel full of water on which it appears is remote from me.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because a reflection is without concepts. In the same way, Blessed Lord, though bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not think, ‘The level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas is remote from me. Unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is near.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because the perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual.
- 48.23 “Blessed Lord, in the perfection of wisdom there is nothing pleasant or unpleasant. If one were to ask why, it is because no essential nature is apprehended through which it would become pleasant or unpleasant. Blessed Lord, just as to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas [F.51.a] there is nothing pleasant or unpleasant, in the same way, Blessed Lord, in the perfection of wisdom, too, there is nothing pleasant or unpleasant.
- 48.24 “Blessed Lord, just as the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, have abandoned all concepts, in the same way, Blessed Lord, though bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they abandon all concepts. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because the perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual.
- 48.25 “Blessed Lord, a phantom emanation of the Tathāgata does not think, ‘The level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas is remote from me. Unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is near.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because the Tathāgata and a phantom emanation of the Tathāgata are without concepts. In the same way, Blessed Lord, though bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not think, ‘The level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas is remote from me. Unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is near.’ If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because the perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual.

48.26 “Blessed Lord, it is just as when the tathāgatas create a phantom emanation—it engages with the purpose for which it was emanated, but the phantom does not think and is without concepts. {Ki.V: 50} In the same way, Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom, too, acts according to the objective for which it is expressed. This perfection of wisdom does not think and it is nonconceptual.

48.27 “Blessed Lord, it is just as when a carpenter or [F.51.b] the skilled apprentice of a carpenter makes a machine in the shape of a woman, or in the shape of a man, or in the shape of an elephant, or in the shape of a horse, or in the shape of a bull—though this machine may perform according to its objective, it is without concepts. In the same way, Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom also acts according to the objective for which it is expressed, but this perfection of wisdom is nonconceptual.” {Ki.V: 38}

48.28 Thereupon the venerable Śāradvatīputra addressed the venerable Subhūti: “Venerable Subhūti, is it only the perfection of wisdom that is nonconceptual, or are the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity also nonconceptual?”⁴⁸⁰

48.29 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra,” replied Subhūti, “the perfection of meditative concentration is also nonconceptual. The perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are also nonconceptual.”

48.30 “Venerable Subhūti, are physical forms also nonconceptual? Are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness also nonconceptual? Are the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination also nonconceptual? Are the perfections also nonconceptual? Are all the aspects of emptiness also nonconceptual? Are the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment also nonconceptual? Are the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions also nonconceptual? Are the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.52.a] emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness also nonconceptual? Are the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways also nonconceptual? Are the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas also nonconceptual? Are the conditioned elements and the nonconditioned elements also nonconceptual?”

“Venerable Śāradvatīputra, all phenomena are nonconceptual!” replied Subhūti.

- 48.31 “Venerable Subhūti, if all phenomena are nonconceptual, how has this differentiation come about with regard to the cycle of existence with its five realms of living beings, namely the denizens of the hells, the animal domain, the world of Yama, the world of the gods, and the world of humankind? How are those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, those who are destined for only one more rebirth, those who will no longer be reborn, those who are arhats, those who are pratyekabuddhas, those who are bodhisattvas, and those who are the lord buddhas to be designated?”
- 48.32 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra,” replied Subhūti, “beings who erroneously actualize the impact of past actions through body, speech, and mind have materialized sense fields such as these, and through concepts they have acquired the base of the aggregates that constitute the ripening of past actions. Thereby they materialize as the denizens of the hells, and the beings of the animal domain, the world of Yama, and the realms of gods and humans.
- 48.33 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, you asked how those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa are designated, and how those who are said to be destined for only one more rebirth, those who will no longer be reborn, those who are arhats, those who are pratyekabuddhas, {Ki.V: 39} [F.52.b] those who are bodhisattvas, and those who are tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are designated. Venerable Śāradvatīputra, those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa are designated through nonconceptuality, and the fruit of having entered the stream to nirvāṇa is designated through nonconceptuality. Those who are destined for only one more rebirth, those who will no longer be reborn, and those who are arhats are designated through nonconceptuality. Pratyekabuddhas and individual enlightenment are designated through nonconceptuality. The buddhas are designated through nonconceptuality. Enlightenment is designated through nonconceptuality.
- 48.34 “Venerable Śāradvatīputra, all those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who appeared in the past were nonconceptual and had abandoned concepts. Venerable Śāradvatīputra, those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who will appear in the future will also be nonconceptual, and they will have abandoned concepts. Venerable Śāradvatīputra, all those lord buddhas who attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment at the present time in the world systems of the ten directions are also nonconceptual, and they absolutely abandon concepts. That, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, is the formulation explaining how one should know, once the real nature of nonconceptuality, the real nature of the very limit of reality, and the real nature of the realm of phenomena have been evaluated, that all phenomena are nonconceptual.

Venerable Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings should accordingly practice the nonconceptual perfection of wisdom. [F.53.a] By practicing the nonconceptual perfection of wisdom, they will attain consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena that are nonconceptual.”

48.35 This completes the forty-eighth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.” [B56]

CHAPTER 49

49.1 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra said to the venerable Subhūti, “Indeed, Venerable Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom practice that which is the essence.”⁴⁸¹

49.2 The venerable Subhūti replied to the venerable Śāradvatīputra, “Indeed, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom practice that which is essenceless. If you ask why, Venerable Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom is essenceless. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are essenceless. The emptiness of internal phenomena is essenceless. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are essenceless. The applications of mindfulness are essenceless. The correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are essenceless. [The fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are essenceless. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are essenceless.” [F.53.b]

49.3 Then the vast multitude of gods inhabiting the realm of desire and inhabiting the realm of form thought, “Those noble sons or noble daughters who set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, who practice this profound perfection of wisdom, just as it has been explained, and who, despite practicing with that goal, do not actualize the very limit of reality through which they would remain on the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas are all worthy of homage. For this reason, too, bodhisattva great beings who do not actualize the sameness of all phenomena are worthy of homage.”

- 49.4 Then the venerable Subhūti said to those gods, {Ki.V: 40} “Divine princes, the difficulty for those bodhisattva great beings is not that they do not actualize the sameness of all phenomena, by doing which they would remain on the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, but, divine princes, beyond that, the difficulty is that they don the armor that establishes inestimable, countless, and immeasurable beings in final nirvāṇa, when those beings whom they would lead to final nirvāṇa are utterly nonapprehensible.
- 49.5 “Bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly and think they should train all beings, having set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, resolving to train all beings, might as well think that they should train space. If you ask why, beings should be regarded as void because space itself is void. Beings should be regarded as emptiness because space itself is emptiness. Beings should be regarded as essencelessness because space itself is essenceless. [F.54.a] Beings should be regarded as vacuity because space itself is vacuous. For this reason, divine princes, it is difficult for bodhisattva great beings who don the armor [of great compassion] for the sake of beings who do not exist. Those who, for the sake of beings, don the armor [of great compassion] might as well seek to do battle with space.
- 49.6 “The armor that bodhisattva great beings don and the beings for whose sake they don the armor are both nonapprehensible. If you ask why, the armor that they don for the sake of beings should be regarded as void. If, when this is explained, bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, then they do practice the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, beings are void because physical forms are void. Beings are void because feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are void. Beings are void because the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are void. Beings are void because the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are void. Beings are void because [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are void. Beings are void because [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are void.
- 49.7 “The perfection of wisdom is void because physical forms are void. The perfection of wisdom is void because feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are void. The perfection of wisdom is void because the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are void. The perfection of wisdom is void because the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and [F.54.b] the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are void. The perfection of wisdom is void because [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are void. The perfection of wisdom is void because [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are void.

49.8 “Divine princes, when it is taught that all phenomena are void, if bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged and not cowed, and their minds are not afraid, then those bodhisattva great beings do practice the perfection of wisdom.”

49.9 Then the Blessed One asked the venerable Subhūti, “Why, Subhūti, do bodhisattva great beings not become discouraged with regard to the perfection of wisdom?”

49.10 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings do not become discouraged with regard to the perfection of wisdom because all phenomena are nonexistent. Bodhisattva great beings do not become discouraged with regard to the perfection of wisdom because all phenomena are void, at peace, and nonarising. For this reason, Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings do not become discouraged with regard to the perfection of wisdom. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because all phenomena are nonexistent and nonapprehensible {Ki.V: 41} in terms of the subject who would be discouraged, the instrument that would bring about discouragement, and the object of discouragement.

49.11 “Blessed Lord, if, when this is explained, bodhisattva great beings are not discouraged, not fearful, not exasperated, not indolent, not afraid, and will not be terrified, then they are practicing the perfection of wisdom. If one were to ask why, [F.55.a] Blessed Lord, it is because all those are nonexistent in terms of the subject who would be discouraged, the instrument that would bring about discouragement, and the object of discouragement. Blessed Lord, the gods headed by Indra, those headed by Brahmā, and those headed by Prajāpati will pay homage to bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly.”

49.12 The Blessed One then replied, “Subhūti, it is not only the gods headed by Indra, those headed by Brahmā, and those headed by Prajāpati who will pay homage to those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, but also the gods of the Śubhakarṣṇa realms, those of the Br̥hatphala realms, and those of the Pure Abodes who are of most sublime complexion will pay homage to those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom accordingly. Subhūti, all the inestimable, countless, and immeasurable tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are alive at present in the world systems of the ten directions will also turn their enlightened intention toward those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom. That is to say, they will think, ‘Those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom completely perfect the perfection of generosity, and they completely perfect the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They completely perfect the emptiness of internal phenomena, [F.55.b] and they completely perfect [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They completely perfect the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They completely perfect the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They completely perfect the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They completely perfect the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They completely perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’

49.13 “Subhūti, one should know that those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, and to whom the lord buddhas direct their enlightened intention, will set out for buddhahood.

49.14 “Subhūti, if all the beings, as many as there are, in world systems as numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, were to transform into evil Māras, and if each of these Māras were also to emanate just as many evil Māras again, they would all be powerless to obstruct those bodhisattva great beings.

49.15 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are endowed with two attributes will not be subdued by those evil Māras. If you ask what these two are, they are to regard all phenomena as emptiness and not to abandon all beings. [F.56.a] Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are endowed with these two attributes will not be subdued by evil Māras.

49.16 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who are endowed with two [other] attributes will not be subdued by evil Māras. {Ki.V: 42} If you ask what these two are, they should do exactly what they say they will do, and they should be kept in mind by the lord buddhas. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom and are endowed with these two attributes will not be subdued by evil Māras.

49.17 “Subhūti, the gods will also think to approach bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly; they will venerate them, and ask questions and counter-questions, enthusiastically saying, ‘Noble child, you should swiftly attain the enlightenment of the buddhas. Therefore, noble child, you should dwell in accordance with emptiness, you should dwell in accordance with signlessness, and you should dwell in accordance with wishlessness. If you ask why, noble child, dwelling in that manner, you will become a protector of beings who are without a protector, you will become a refuge for beings who are without a refuge, you will become an ally of beings who are without allies, you will become a sanctuary of beings who are without sanctuary, you will become a support for beings who are without support, you will become an island for beings without an island, and you will become a light for beings who are shrouded in darkness.’ If you ask why, it is because all the lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in the inestimable and countless world systems, [F.56.b] surrounded by their monastic communities of monks, will continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of proclaiming the names and families of these bodhisattva great beings who possess the attributes of the perfection of wisdom.

49.18 “For example, Subhūti, now I continue to teach the Dharma and make pronouncements by way of proclaiming the name of the bodhisattva great being Ratnaketu, and I continue to teach the Dharma and make pronouncements by way of proclaiming the name of the bodhisattva great being Śikhin, {Ki.V: 43} and I continue to teach the Dharma and make pronouncements by way of proclaiming the names of those who, in the service of the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha Akṣobhya, practiced chastity without being separated from the perfection of wisdom.

49.19 “All the lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma [in the world systems] of the eastern direction, will also continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of rejoicing in all the bodhisattva great beings there who are practicing chastity without being separated from the perfection of wisdom.

49.20 “All the lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, will also continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of rejoicing in all the bodhisattva great beings there [F.57.a] who are practicing chastity without being separated from the perfection of wisdom.

49.21 “These lord buddhas will also continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of rejoicing in all the bodhisattva great beings who—from when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they have attained all-aspect omniscience—have been refining the path of enlightenment. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because those bodhisattva great beings who are progressing so as not to interrupt the way to buddhahood are doing something that is difficult.”

- 49.22 “Blessed Lord, while teaching the Dharma, do those lord buddhas proclaim the names of bodhisattva great beings who may regress, or of those whose progress is irreversible?”
- 49.23 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “among irreversible bodhisattva great beings there are those who practice the perfection of wisdom. Among bodhisattva great beings who have not been prophesied, there are also those who practice the perfection of wisdom. The lord buddhas will continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of rejoicing in them, too.”
- 49.24 “Blessed Lord, who are they?”
- “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the conduct of a bodhisattva, the lord buddhas continue to teach the Dharma and make pronouncements by way of rejoicing in those who are engaged in training under the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya. Subhūti, [F.57.b] the lord buddhas also continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of rejoicing in those who are engaged in training in the conduct of a bodhisattva under the bodhisattva great being Ratnaketu.
- 49.25 “Moreover, Subhūti, there are bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, and who believe that all phenomena are nonarising, {Ki.V: 44} but have not yet accepted that phenomena are nonarising. Although they believe that all phenomena are empty, that all phenomena are at peace, that all phenomena are vacuous, hollow, and dependent, and that all phenomena are without essence, they have not yet accepted that phenomena are nonarising. By way of rejoicing in them, too, the lord buddhas also continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements.
- 49.26 “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings whose names the lord buddhas continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of proclaiming are indeed prophesied, after transcending the levels of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas, to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings practicing the perfection of wisdom whose names the lord buddhas continue to teach the Dharma and make their pronouncements by way of proclaiming will dwell in the irreversible state, and abiding in it, they will attain all-aspect omniscience.
- 49.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings hear the explanation of the profound perfection of wisdom, if they are free from doubt, free from hesitation, and free from delusion, accepting that this exactly accords with the explanation given by the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, [F.58.a] then they will subsequently also hear this perfection of wisdom more extensively in the presence of the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha Akṣobhya and of those noble children who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. Those noble children who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas will also dwell in the irreversible state because they believe in the profound perfection of wisdom, and they believe in it, just as it has been taught by the tathāgatas.

49.28 “Subhūti, since bodhisattva great beings who hear this perfection of wisdom will have many advantages, one need not even speak of those who, having heard it, believe in it, dwell in the real nature, and are earnestly intent on the real nature. Abiding in the real nature and earnestly intent on the real nature, they will dwell in all-aspect omniscience.”

49.29 “Blessed Lord, when they dwell in the real nature, earnestly intent on the real nature, if they do not apprehend anything at all, how then will they dwell in all-aspect omniscience? Blessed Lord, when, apart from the real nature, there is nothing apprehensible at all, who will dwell in this real nature? Who, abiding in the real nature, will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Who will dwell in the real nature and teach the Dharma? Blessed Lord! When the real nature is itself nonapprehensible, how could one speak of anyone abiding in the real nature, attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment while abiding in the real nature, and teaching the Dharma while abiding in the real nature? That would be impossible!”⁴⁸² [F.58.b]

49.30 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “you have said, ‘Apart from the real nature, there is nothing apprehensible at all that would dwell in the real nature, that would, abiding in the real nature, attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and that would, abiding in the real nature, teach the Dharma. When the real nature is itself nonapprehensible, how could one speak of anyone abiding in the real nature, attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment while abiding in the real nature, and teaching the Dharma while abiding in the real nature? That would be impossible!’ That is so, Subhūti! That is so. It is as you have said. Subhūti, apart from the real nature, there is nothing apprehensible at all that would dwell in the real nature, that would, abiding in the real nature, attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and that would, abiding in the real nature, teach the Dharma. When the real nature is itself nonapprehensible, how could one speak of anyone abiding in the real nature, attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment while abiding in the real nature, and teaching the Dharma while abiding in the real nature? That would be impossible!

- 49.31 “If you ask why, Subhūti, whether the tathāgatas have appeared or not, the real nature of phenomena, the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, and reality do dwell. With respect to all phenomena, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, the maturity of all phenomena, and the very limit of reality do dwell. Subhūti, there is nothing at all that dwells in this real nature. [F.59.a] Since there is no one at all who will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, while abiding in that [real nature], how could one speak of anyone teaching the Dharma while abiding in that real nature? That would be impossible!”
- 49.32 Thereupon, Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, this perfection of wisdom is profound. Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who seek to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment are achieving something that is difficult. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because nothing at all is apprehensible. There is no one who would dwell in the real nature, nor is there anything that would attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Nor is there anything that would teach the Dharma. Those who will not be discouraged, who do not succumb to doubt, or who do not become deluded with respect to such [profound attributes] achieve that which is difficult.”⁴⁸³ {Ki.V: 66}
- 49.33 Then the elder Subhūti said to Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, “Kauśika, you have said, ‘Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who do not succumb to doubt and who do not become deluded with respect to these profound attributes are achieving something that is difficult.’ Kauśika, since all phenomena are emptiness, who is there who could possibly succumb to doubt or become deluded!”
- 49.34 Śakra replied, “Whatever the elder Subhūti teaches, he does so commencing with emptiness. There is nothing to impede him, just as there is nothing to impede an arrow fired into the sky. In the same way, when the elder Subhūti teaches the Dharma there is nothing to impede him.” [F.59.b]
- 49.35 This completes the forty-ninth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

- 50.1 Then Śakra, mighty lord of the gods, asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, is it prophesied that by preaching in that manner and speaking in that manner, I will reiterate the words spoken by the Blessed One, teach the Dharma, and genuinely proclaim the nature of reality, striving in accordance with the Dharma?”
- 50.2 “Kauśika,” replied the Blessed One, “it is prophesied that by preaching in that manner and speaking in that manner, you will reiterate the words spoken by the Blessed One, teach the Dharma, and [genuinely proclaim] the nature of reality, striving in accordance with the Dharma.” {Ki.V:67}
- 50.3 “Blessed Lord, it is most wonderful how this elder Subhūti speaks inspirationally,” said Śakra. “In all respects, he speaks inspirationally about emptiness. He speaks inspirationally about signlessness. He speaks inspirationally about wishlessness. He speaks inspirationally about the perfection of generosity. He speaks inspirationally about the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. He speaks inspirationally about the emptiness of internal phenomena, and [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. He speaks inspirationally about the applications of mindfulness, and he speaks inspirationally about the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. He speaks inspirationally about the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. [F.60.a] He speaks inspirationally about the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. He speaks inspirationally about the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. He speaks inspirationally about [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

“Kauśika,” replied the Blessed One, “since the elder Subhūti does not apprehend even the perfection of generosity because he dwells in emptiness, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone practicing the perfection of generosity? Since he does not apprehend even the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone practicing the perfection of wisdom [and so forth]? Since he does not apprehend even the emptiness of internal phenomena, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone cultivating the emptiness of internal phenomena? Since he does not apprehend even [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone cultivating the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]? Since he does not apprehend even the applications of mindfulness, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone cultivating the applications of mindfulness? Since he does not apprehend even the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone cultivating the noble eightfold path [and so forth]? Since he does not apprehend even the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions, [F.60.b] how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone cultivating the formless absorptions [and so forth]? Since he does not apprehend even the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone cultivating the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]? Since he does not apprehend even the powers of the tathāgatas, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone actualizing the powers of the tathāgatas? Since he does not apprehend even the fearlessnesses, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone actualizing the fearlessnesses? Since he does not apprehend even the kinds of exact knowledge, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone actualizing the kinds of exact knowledge? Since he does not apprehend even great compassion, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone practicing great compassion? Since he does not apprehend even the distinct qualities of the buddhas, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone actualizing the distinct qualities of the buddhas? Since he does not apprehend even the branches of enlightenment, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone attaining consummate buddhahood, enlightenment? Since he does not apprehend even all-aspect omniscience, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone attaining all-aspect omniscience? Since he does not apprehend even the Tathāgata, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone becoming a tathāgata? Since he does not apprehend even the nature of nonarising, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone realizing the nature of nonarising? Since he does not apprehend even the major marks, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone's body having the major marks! Since he does not apprehend even the minor marks, how could he possibly [apprehend] anyone's body having the minor marks?

50.5 “If you ask why, Kauśika, the elder Subhūti dwells in the voidness of all phenomena. He dwells in nonapprehension, he dwells in emptiness, [F.61.a] he dwells in signlessness, and he dwells in wishlessness. However, Kauśika, this abiding of the elder Subhūti comes nowhere near even a hundredth part of the abiding of bodhisattva great beings who dwell in the perfection of wisdom. It comes nowhere near even a thousandth part, a hundred thousandth part, or a one hundred billion trillionth part of it. Nor can it stand up to any number, fraction, categorization, comparison, or quality. If you ask why, except for the abiding of the tathāgatas, among the [other sorts of abiding], namely the abiding of bodhisattva great beings, the abiding of the śrāvakas, and the abiding of the pratyekabuddhas, it is the abiding of bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom that is said to be supreme. It is said to be best, it is said to be foremost, it is said to be sacred, it is said to be perfect, it is said to be supreme, it is said to be sublime, it is said to be unsurpassed, it is said to be highest, it is said to be unequaled, and it is said to be equal to the unequaled. Therefore, Kauśika, bodhisattva great beings who wish to become supreme among all beings should dwell in accordance with this abiding of the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, Kauśika, bodhisattva great beings who practice this perfection of wisdom pass beyond the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. They enter a bodhisattva's full maturity, and, having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they perfect the attributes of the buddhas. [F.61.b] Having perfected the attributes of the buddhas, they attain the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. Having attained the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience, they become tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas in whom all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities are abandoned.”

50.6 Then, within that assembly, the gods of the Trayastrimśa realm took many coral flowers, and sprinkled them, scattered them, and showered them toward the Blessed One. Some six thousand monks also rose from their seats, and, with their upper robe over one shoulder, resting their right knee on the ground, and placing their hands together in the gesture of homage alongside the Blessed One, they bowed toward the Blessed One, paying homage with their eyes wide open. When these monks bowed with their hands together in the gesture of homage, by the power of the buddhas their cupped hands were filled with coral flowers, and they then sprinkled these coral flowers, scattered them, and showered them toward the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha. {Ki.V: 69} At that time, they said, “Blessed Lord, through this root of virtue may we dwell in accordance with the highest abiding, which is not within the perceptual range of any of the śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas!”

50.7 It was at that moment that the Blessed One, understanding the aspiration of these monks, smiled. The true nature of the lord buddhas is indeed such that when the Blessed One smiled diverse rays of light were diffused from his mouth in the colors blue, yellow, red, white, scarlet, crystal, [F.62.a] and silver. These rays extensively filled the world system of the great trichilocosm with light, and then were reabsorbed, circling the Blessed One three times before vanishing into the crown of the Blessed One’s head.

50.8 Then the venerable Ānanda arose from his seat, and with his upper robe over one shoulder, he rested his right knee on the ground. Placing his hands together in the gesture of homage, he bowed toward the Blessed One, saying, “Blessed Lord, since the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not smile without a reason or circumstances, what is the reason and what are the circumstances for your smile?”

50.9 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Ānanda as follows: “Ānanda, these six thousand monks, during the eon of Tārakopama, will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they will all appear in the world as tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas named Avakīrṇakusuma. Ānanda, the monastic communities of those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas named Avakīrṇakusuma will be similar. Their buddhafi elds will be similar and their lifespans of a thousand years will also be similar. Wherever they are emancipated [from the household life]; wherever, after being emancipated, they are ordained as mendicants; and wherever, having been ordained as mendicants, they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, showers of five-colored flowers will rain down on them all. Therefore, Ānanda, [F.62.b] bodhisattva great beings who wish to dwell in accordance with the highest abiding should practice this perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings who wish to dwell in accordance with the abiding of the tathāgatas should practice this perfection of wisdom.

- 50.10 “Ānanda, any noble son or noble daughter who practices this profound perfection of wisdom should certainly know that when they themselves have died among human beings and transmigrated, they will be reborn here, or else when they have died among the gods of the Tuṣita realm, they will be reborn here. For it is among human beings that this profound perfection of wisdom is extensively heard, {Ki.V: 70} or among the gods of the Tuṣita realm that this profound perfection of wisdom is extensively heard.
- 50.11 “Ānanda, those bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom will be observed by the tathāgatas. Ānanda, when any noble sons or noble daughters who hear this profound perfection of wisdom, and, having listened to it, then take up, uphold, recite, master, and focus their attention correctly on it, and then reveal and teach this profound perfection of wisdom to individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, those individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should certainly know that they themselves will have heard this profound perfection of wisdom from the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, and will have taken up, upheld, recited, and mastered it. They will have cultivated many roots of virtuous action in the presence of those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. [F.63.a]
- 50.12 “Ānanda, these noble sons or noble daughters should know that they will not cultivate the roots of virtuous action in the presence of śrāvakas, and they will not hear this profound perfection of wisdom from śrāvakas.
- 50.13 “Ānanda, if any noble sons or noble daughters take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom, comprehending it according to its meaning, attributes, and letters, then, Ānanda, those noble sons or noble daughters should know that they will have been face-to-face with the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas.
- 50.14 “Ānanda, if any noble sons or noble daughters, on hearing this profound perfection of wisdom being taught, do not turn away from it or speak ill of it, but if after hearing it they acquire firm belief, then, Ānanda, those noble sons or noble daughters should know that they have acted in the service of the conquerors of the past, cultivated the roots of virtuous action, and been accepted by a spiritual mentor.
- 50.15 “Ānanda, that they have cultivated the roots of virtuous action in the presence of tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas is unfailing, and they will indeed become śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, or buddhas. Nevertheless, Ānanda, bodhisattva great beings should reach a very full understanding by practicing the perfection of generosity; by practicing the perfection of ethical discipline; by practicing the perfection of tolerance; by practicing the perfection of perseverance; by practicing the perfection of meditative concentration; by practicing the perfection of wisdom; by practicing all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, [F.63.b] the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and by practicing [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.V: 71} Bodhisattva great beings with a very full understanding who practice the perfection of generosity; who practice the perfection of ethical discipline; who practice the perfection of tolerance; who practice the perfection of perseverance; who practice the perfection of meditative concentration and the perfection of wisdom; who practice the emptiness of internal phenomena; who practice [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; who practice the applications of mindfulness; who practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; who practice [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and who practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do not become śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas.

50.16 “Therefore, Ānanda, I entrust this profound perfection of wisdom to you. Ānanda, even if, among all those doctrines that I have explained, you were to subsequently squander and discard all those teachings of mine that you have held and mastered, with the exception of the perfection of wisdom, then, Ānanda, I would not consider you to be at fault on that account. On the other hand, Ānanda, [F.64.a] if you were to subsequently squander or discard this profound perfection of wisdom that you have held and mastered, then, Ānanda, I would consider you to be at fault on that account. Therefore, Ānanda, you should take up, uphold, recite, and master it by all means! You should absolutely hold it in your mind. You should grasp it well, master it well, retain it well, absolutely perfect its letters, words, and syllables, and absolutely and properly comprehend its definitions.

50.17 “Ānanda, any noble sons or noble daughters who take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom will uphold the enlightenment of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present. Ānanda, any noble sons or noble daughters who hold this profound perfection of wisdom will facilitate the enlightenment of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present. Ānanda, those who wish to serve, respect, honor, and worship it in my presence, with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners, and ribbons, should take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom. After taking up, upholding, and reciting this profound perfection of wisdom, they should master it, and serve, respect, honor, and worship it with flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, powders, robes, parasols, victory banners and ribbons. [F.64.b] If they serve, respect, honor, and worship the perfection of wisdom, they will also worship me, and they will also worship the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present. Ānanda, when this profound perfection of wisdom {Ki.V: 72} is being taught, any who serve, delight, and believe in it will serve, delight, and believe in the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present. Ānanda, if you have not forsaken me because I am dear and pleasant to you, then, Ānanda, this perfection of wisdom will be dear and pleasant to you, and you should not forsake it. You should by all means not squander even a single word of this profound perfection of wisdom.

50.18 “Ānanda, as I begin to entrust this profound perfection of wisdom, although I have imparted a great many teachings to you, in short, Ānanda, just as I have been your teacher, so this perfection of wisdom is also your teacher. Therefore, Ānanda, with this measureless bestowal, I entrust this profound perfection of wisdom to you. Therefore, Ānanda, I declare in the presence of the world with its gods, humans, and asuras, that anyone who would not forsake the Buddha, who would not forsake the Dharma, who would not forsake the Saṅgha, who would not forsake the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, and who would not forsake the enlightenment of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present, should not forsake this perfection of wisdom. This is my instruction! [F.65.a]

50.19 “Ānanda, any noble sons or noble daughters who take up, uphold, recite, propagate, and master this profound perfection of wisdom, focusing their attention correctly on it, and also with many formulations extensively explain, teach, indicate, make known, establish, interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal this profound perfection of wisdom to others, will swiftly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They are approaching all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, Ānanda, it is because the unsurpassed, complete enlightenment of the lord buddhas, which brought forth all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past, also originated from this very perfection of wisdom. Ānanda, the unsurpassed, complete enlightenment of the lord buddhas, which will bring forth all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the future, will also originate from this very perfection of wisdom. Ānanda, the unsurpassed, complete enlightenment of the lord buddhas who are alive at present as all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the present, teaching the Dharma in the countless, immeasurable, and inestimable world systems of the eastern, southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, also originates from this very perfection of wisdom. {Ki.V:73} [F.65.b]

50.20 “Therefore, Ānanda, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and who wish to train in the six perfections, should train in this profound perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, Ānanda, it is because the perfection of wisdom is the mother who gives birth to bodhisattva great beings. Ānanda, all those bodhisattva great beings who train in the six perfections will be emancipated in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Therefore, Ānanda, I entrust and further entrust these six perfections to you, again and again. If you ask why, Ānanda, this is the repository of the Dharma of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. This repository of the six perfections is the inexhaustible repository of the Dharma.

50.21 “Ānanda, even those lord buddhas who are alive at present—all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who teach the Dharma in the countless, immeasurable, and inestimable world systems of the ten directions—teach the Dharma that derives from this repository of the six perfections. Ānanda, even all those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who appeared in the past have trained in these six perfections, and taught the Dharma, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Ānanda, even all those tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who will appear in the future will train in these six perfections, [F.66.a] and teach the Dharma, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Ānanda, even all those who are the śrāvakas of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present have passed into final nirvāṇa, are passing into final nirvāṇa, and will pass into final nirvāṇa, after training in this very perfection of wisdom.

50.22 “Ānanda, even if you were to teach the Dharma, commencing with [the level of] the śrāvakas, to individuals who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas, and all the beings that there are in the world system of the great trichiliocosm were, on the basis of that teaching of the Dharma, to realize the state of arhatship, you, a śrāvaka, would not yet perform the deeds of my śrāvakas. But, Ānanda, if you were to speak and teach to bodhisattva great beings even a single word associated with the perfection of wisdom, you, a śrāvaka, would please me, and, being a śrāvaka, you would perform the deeds of a śrāvaka.

50.23 “Ānanda, if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were to realize, sooner or later, the state of arhatship on the basis of your former teaching of the Dharma, do you think that there would be many foundations of merit arising from the generosity of those arhats, and many foundations of merit arising from their ethical discipline and arising from their meditation?" {Ki.V:74}

"Yes, there would, Blessed Lord! Yes, there would, Sugata!"

50.24 "Ānanda," continued the Blessed One, "if individuals who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas were to teach the Dharma associated with the perfection of wisdom to bodhisattva great beings for at least one day, [F.66.b] their merit would increase more greatly than that. Ānanda, leaving aside one day, if individuals who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas were to teach the Dharma associated with the perfection of wisdom to bodhisattva great beings for half a day; or, Ānanda, leaving aside half a day, if they were to do so for one morning; or, Ānanda, leaving aside one morning, if they were to do so for about twenty-four minutes; or, Ānanda, leaving aside twenty-four minutes, if they were to do so for an instant, a moment, or a split second, then, Ānanda, their merit would increase more greatly. They would surpass even the roots of virtuous action of all those noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicles of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

50.25 "Ānanda, if bodhisattva great beings were to teach the Dharma associated with the perfection of wisdom to individuals who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas for at least one day, or half a day, or one morning, or about twenty-four minutes, or an instant, a moment, or a split second, then, Ānanda, those bodhisattva great beings would surpass the roots of virtuous action of all noble sons or noble daughters who follow the vehicles of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas.

50.26 "If you ask why, it is because they themselves wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they also encourage others toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, causing them to rejoice and delight, exhorting them, and establishing them in it. Ānanda, it is impossible that the roots of virtuous action of bodhisattva great beings who practice the six perfections in that manner; who practice the four applications of mindfulness; [F.67.a] who practice the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; who practice the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; who practice the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and who practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, would dwindle when in fact they increase manifold. There is no chance, no possibility.”

50.27 When this perfection of wisdom was being explained, the Blessed One manifested his miraculous power in the presence of the four assemblies [of practitioners] and the gods, human beings, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, and mahoragas who were there, {Ki.V: 75} such that they all saw the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya, surrounded and attended on all sides by an entourage entirely comprising bodhisattva great beings and a community of monks that resembled an unagitated ocean. All of them were arhats who had attained the cessation of contaminants, and were without afflicted mental states, fully controlled, their minds well liberated, their wisdom well liberated, thoroughbreds, mighty nāgas, their tasks accomplished, their work completed, their burdens relinquished, their own objectives fulfilled, [F.67.b] the fetters binding them to the rebirth process completely severed, their minds well liberated by means of genuine teaching, absolutely supreme above all beings in their perfection of all mental faculties. Then the Blessed One withdrew the miraculous power that he had manifested, so that those four assemblies no longer saw the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya. They no longer saw those individual śrāvakas or those followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas. They no longer saw the field of that tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya. The community of monks, headed by the Buddha, no longer appeared within the range of their vision. If one were to ask why, they did not see them because the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya had withdrawn the miraculous power that he had [previously] manifested.

50.28 Then the Blessed One asked the venerable Ānanda, “Do you now see the field of the Tathāgata Akṣobhya—the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya, the community of monks, and the community of bodhisattvas?”

50.29 “Blessed Lord, I no longer see that buddhafiield. I no longer see that tathāgata. I no longer see that community of monks. I no longer see that community of bodhisattvas. It is not within the range of my vision.” [F.68.a]

50.30 “In the same way, Ānanda,” continued the Blessed One, “there are no phenomena that appear within the range of vision. There is nothing that appears to anything. There is nothing that sees anything. There is nothing that knows anything. Ānanda, just as the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha Akṣobhya, those śrāvakas, those followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, and those buddhafiields do not appear within the range of vision, in the same way there is nothing at all that appears within the range of vision. There is nothing that appears to anything. There is nothing that sees anything. There is nothing that knows anything. Ānanda, all phenomena are unknown, unseen, inactive, and absolutely incapable of action. If you ask why, all phenomena are inactive and ungraspable because they are like space, which is inactive.

50.31 “Ānanda, all phenomena are inconceivable, like an illusory man. Ānanda, all phenomena are without thought and unknown because they lack defining characteristics established through fabrication and they are essenceless. Bodhisattva great beings who practice accordingly practice the perfection of wisdom, and they are fixated on nothing at all. {Ki.V: 76}

50.32 “Ānanda, bodhisattva great beings who train in that manner train in the perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings who wish to complete all the perfections should train in the perfection of wisdom. Those who train in that manner are said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled. [F.68.b] They are intent on the benefit of all worlds and the happiness of all worlds. They are protectors of the unprotected, favored by the buddhas and praised by the buddhas. Even if the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas were to raise up this world system of the great trichiliocosm with their right hand and then let it drop, those beings would not know that this world system of the great trichiliocosm was being raised up, or that it was being dropped. If you ask why, Ānanda, through having trained in this very perfection of wisdom, the lord buddhas indeed attain the vision of wisdom that is unimpeded with respect to phenomena of the past, future, and present. Ānanda, among all the trainings that there are, the training in the perfection of wisdom is said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled.

50.33 “Ānanda, to wish to grasp the measure or explore the limits of the perfection of wisdom would simply be to wish to grasp the measure or explore the limits of space. If you ask why, Ānanda, the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable. Ānanda, I have not taught that the perfection of wisdom can be measured. Clusters of nouns, clusters of words, and clusters of syllables are measurable, but the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable.”

50.34 “Blessed Lord, why is the perfection of wisdom immeasurable?”

“Ānanda,” replied the Blessed One, [F.69.a] “the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because it is inexhaustible. Ānanda, the perfection of wisdom is immeasurable because it is void. Ānanda, all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the past have also originated from this same perfection of wisdom, and the perfection of wisdom has not been exhausted. Ānanda, all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas of the future will also originate from this same perfection of wisdom, and the perfection of wisdom will not be exhausted. {Ki.V: 77} Ānanda, all the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in the world systems of the ten directions, also originate from this same perfection of wisdom, and the perfection of wisdom is not being exhausted. If you ask why, Ānanda, to think of the perfection of wisdom being exhausted would simply be to think of space being exhausted. The perfection of wisdom has not been exhausted, will not be exhausted, and is not being exhausted. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity have not been exhausted, will not be exhausted, and are not being exhausted. The emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, have not been exhausted, will not be exhausted, and are not being exhausted. The applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble [F.69.b] eightfold path have not been exhausted, will not be exhausted, and are not being exhausted. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, [the serial steps of meditative absorption], emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways have not been exhausted, will not be exhausted, and are not being exhausted. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas will not be exhausted and are not being exhausted. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, will not be exhausted and are not being exhausted. Since all phenomena are indeed nonarising, how could they possibly be exhausted!"

50.35 Thereupon the Blessed One stretched out his tongue. Covering his entire face with his tongue, he asked the venerable Ānanda, "Ānanda, do you think that one possessing a tongue such as this would speak falsely or would speak otherwise?"

 "No, Blessed Lord!"

50.36 "Therefore, Ānanda," continued the Blessed One, "you should extensively teach, declare, proclaim, and explain this perfection of wisdom to the four assemblies, establishing it and thoroughly establishing it! You should interpret, analyze, elucidate, and genuinely reveal it! It is from this profound perfection of wisdom that all phenomena have been extensively revealed—those phenomena in which the followers of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the followers of the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and individuals following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should train, and by training in which, as has been explained, they will dwell on their own respective levels. {Ki.V: 78} [F.70.a]

50.37 “Ānanda, this profound perfection of wisdom is an entrance to all syllables. Ānanda, this profound perfection of wisdom is the gateway of all dhāraṇīs in which bodhisattva great beings should train. Bodhisattva great beings who retain these dhāraṇīs will realize all the gateways to inspired eloquence and exact knowledge.

50.38 “Ānanda, I have explained this perfection of wisdom to be the inexhaustible repository of the Dharma of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present. Therefore, Ānanda, you should have confidence in it and master it. Those who take up, uphold, recite, and master this profound perfection of wisdom uphold the enlightenment of the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present. Ānanda, this is the dhāraṇī of the perfection of wisdom that I have taught, and by retaining which you will retain all phenomena.”

50.39 This completes the fiftieth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.” [B57]

CHAPTER 51

- 51.1 Then the venerable Subhūti thought, “Since the perfection of wisdom is indeed profound, and the enlightenment of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas is also profound, I should question the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha about it.” Thereupon the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, [F.70.b] the perfection of wisdom is inexhaustible.”

“Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom is inexhaustible because space is inexhaustible,” replied the Blessed One.

- 51.2 “Blessed Lord, how should the perfection of wisdom be brought into being?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of physical forms. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the perfection of generosity. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the emptiness of internal phenomena. The perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the applications of mindfulness. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, {Ki.V: 79} the formless absorptions, [F.71.a] the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom should be brought into being through the inexhaustibility of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

- 51.3 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of physical forms. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. Subhūti, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the perfection of generosity. They should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena. [F.71.b] They should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. Subhūti, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the applications of mindfulness. They should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. Subhūti, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. Subhūti, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. Subhūti, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

51.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of ignorance. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of formative predispositions. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of consciousness. Subhūti, [F.72.a] bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of name and form. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the six sense fields. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of sensory contact. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of sensation. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of craving. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of grasping. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of the rebirth process. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of birth. {Ki.V: 80} Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the inexhaustible space-like nature of aging, death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, discomfort, and agitation. Subhūti, it is in that manner that bodhisattva great beings should actualize the perfection of wisdom.

51.5 “Subhūti, this is the observation of the links of dependent origination that bodhisattva great beings make, [F.72.b] the observation of that which they have absolutely renounced. To observe the links of dependent origination is a distinct attribute of bodhisattva great beings who are seated at the site of enlightenment. By observing the links of dependent origination in that manner they will attain the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, those who practice the perfection of wisdom through this actualization of space-like inexhaustibility and observe the links of dependent origination will not dwell on the level of the śrāvakas, or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, but they will dwell in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

51.6 “Subhūti, all those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who are reversible do not rely on this directing of their minds to the perfection of wisdom. They turn back because they do not know how bodhisattva great beings, when they practice the perfection of wisdom, should observe the links of dependent origination by actualizing space-like inexhaustibility. Subhūti, all those individual followers of the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who are reversible turn back from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment because they do not rely on this skill in means. Subhūti, all those bodhisattva great beings who indeed do not turn back from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment do not turn back from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment because they rely on this perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, with skill in means, should observe and actualize the perfection of wisdom by actualizing space-like inexhaustibility. [F.73.a]

51.7 “Subhūti, by observing the links of dependent origination in that manner, bodhisattva great beings do not observe anything that originates without a cause. They do not observe anything that is permanent. They do not observe anything that ceases. They do not observe anything that constitutes a self, being, life form, living being, life, living creature, individual personality, human being, person, actor, agent, petitioner, instigator, experiencer, knower, or viewer. They do not observe anything permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace. Subhūti, when they practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, bodhisattva great beings should observe the links of dependent origination. {Ki.V: 81}

51.8 “Subhūti, at the time when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not observe that physical forms are permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace. They do not observe that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness is permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace. They do not observe that the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination are permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace. [F.73.b] They do not observe that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace.

They do not observe that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the aspects of liberation, [the serial steps of meditative absorption], the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace. They do not observe that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are permanent, impermanent, imbued with happiness or suffering, with self or without self, or at peace or not at peace.

- 51.9 “If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not observe the perfection of wisdom. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the perfection of wisdom. They do not observe the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. [F.74.a] They do not observe the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not observe [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. They do not observe the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. They do not observe the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, {Ki.V: 82} the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They do not observe the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They do not observe [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They do not observe anything at all through which they would observe all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

[F.74.b] They do not observe anything through which they should abandon all reincarnation through the continuity of propensities. Subhūti, so it is that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom without apprehending anything.

51.10 “Subhūti, at the time when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom without apprehending anything, the evil Māra will be pierced with the pain of sorrow. Subhūti, just as a person is pierced with the pain of sorrow at the time when their parents die, and the pains of sorrow they experience will be unbearable, in the same way, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom without apprehending anything, the evil Māra will be pierced with the pain of sorrow, and the pains of sorrow he experiences will be unbearable.”

51.11 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, will it be a single evil Māra that will be pierced by unbearable pains of sorrow, or will all the evil Māras that there are in the world system of the great trichilocosm be pierced by unbearable pains of sorrow?”

51.12 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings engage by dwelling in the perfection of wisdom, all those evil Māras that there are in the world system of the great trichilocosm will be pierced by unbearable pains of sorrow, and will feel disinclined to sit on their respective seats. Yet for bodhisattva great beings who engage in that way, there is nothing the world with its gods, humans, and asuras can do to seize them and turn them back. [F.75.a] Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish swiftly to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should engage by dwelling in the perfection of wisdom. {Ki.V:83}

51.13 “Bodhisattva great beings who engage by dwelling in the perfection of wisdom will complete the cultivation of the perfection of generosity. They will complete the cultivation of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings who engage by dwelling in the perfection of wisdom will complete the cultivation of all the perfections.”

51.14 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings who engage by dwelling in the perfection of wisdom complete the cultivation of the perfection of generosity? How will they complete the cultivation of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom?”

- 51.15 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dispense their gifts, they dispense those gifts while dedicating them to all-aspect omniscience. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of generosity. [F.75.b]
- 51.16 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of ethical discipline, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings maintain their ethical discipline, they maintain that ethical discipline while dedicating it to all-aspect omniscience. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of ethical discipline.
- 51.17 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of tolerance, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings cultivate tolerance, they cultivate that tolerance while dedicating it to all-aspect omniscience. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of tolerance.
- 51.18 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of perseverance, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings undertake perseverance, they undertake that perseverance while dedicating it to all-aspect omniscience. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of perseverance.
- 51.19 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of meditative concentration, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings are absorbed in meditative concentration, they are absorbed in those meditative concentrations while dedicating them to all-aspect omniscience. [F.76.a] It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of meditative concentration.
- 51.20 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings cultivate the perfection of wisdom, they cultivate that wisdom while dedicating it to all-aspect omniscience. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings will complete the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.”
- 51.21 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline?” {Ki.V: 84}

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dispense their gifts, dedicating them to all-aspect omniscience, they affirm on behalf of beings those physical acts of loving kindness, those verbal acts of loving kindness, and those mental acts of loving kindness. When they dispense their gifts, miserliness does not arise. Indeed, they dedicate those gifts toward all-aspect omniscience. At that time, bodhisattva great beings acquire the perfection of ethical discipline.”

51.22 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of tolerance?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dispense their gifts, even though recipients may scold and revile them with disingenuous reprimands and harsh words, [F.76.b] they will not develop a mindset that is inimical to them. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, after abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of tolerance.”

51.23 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of perseverance?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dispense their gifts, even though recipients may scold or revile them with disingenuous reprimands and harsh words, they resort to their generous attitude and their charitable attitude. They develop physical and mental perseverance, [thinking] that they themselves should not desist from dispensing gifts. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of perseverance.”

51.24 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dispense their gifts, they do not dedicate them to the level of the śrāvakas, or to the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Rather, they set their minds on all-aspect omniscience. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration.” {Ki.V: 85} [F.77.a]

51.25 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, while dispensing generosity with skill in means, acquire the perfection of wisdom?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings offer gifts and dispense their gifts, they invariably maintain an illusion-like attitude. They do not discern that any beings are benefited or harmed by these gifts. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of generosity, acquire the perfection of wisdom.”

51.26 This completes the fifty-first chapter from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

CHAPTER 52

52.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of generosity?”

52.2 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who dwell in the perfection of ethical discipline, owing to whatever vows pertaining to body, speech, and mind [that they maintain], do not make contact with the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, they do not kill living creatures, they do not steal that which is not given, they do not commit acts of sexual misconduct, they do not tell lies, they do not slander, they do not speak harsh words of reprimand, they do not speak nonsensically, they do not become covetous, they do not become malicious, and they do not resort to wrong views. Abiding in this perfection of ethical discipline, [F.77.b] they dispense food to those who need food, drink to those who need drink, transport to those who need transport, clothing to those who need clothing, flowers to those who need flowers, garlands to those who need garlands, incense to those who need incense, unguents to those who need unguents, bedding to those who need bedding, sanctuary to those who need sanctuary, sustenance to those who need sustenance, and resources to those who need resources. They dispense all sorts of things that are useful to human beings to those who need them, and when dispensing those gifts in that manner, they dedicate their gifts, making common cause with all beings, toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They make these dedications by all means and make them in such a way that they do not resort to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. It is this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of generosity.”

52.3 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of tolerance?”

- 52.4 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “even if all beings were to approach bodhisattva great beings who dwell in the perfection of ethical discipline, cut off their limbs and appendages, and then depart, those bodhisattva great beings would not get angry with them, nor would they have a single thought of malice. Rather, they would think, {Ki.V: 86} ‘It has been beneficial to me that all these beings have cut off my limbs and appendages and then departed! Through my renunciation of this rotten body, I [F.78.a] shall attain the body of a tathāgata, which originates from the indestructible reality of divine substance!’ It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of tolerance.”
- 52.5 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of perseverance?”
- 52.6 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dwell in the perfection of ethical discipline, they do not slack in their physical or mental perseverance, thinking, ‘I shall liberate all beings from cyclic existence! I shall establish them in the deathless expanse!’ They also dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they make this dedication in such a way that whatever happens they do not resort to the threefold mental interaction between the one who makes the dedication, the dedication that is made, and the one to whom the dedication is made. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of perseverance.”
- 52.7 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration?”
- 52.8 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “at the time when bodhisattva great beings become absorbed in the first meditative concentration, become absorbed in the second, third, and fourth meditative concentrations, and become absorbed in [the other formless absorptions], up to and including cessation, they do not apprehend the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, [F.78.b] and they will, provisionally, not realize the very limit of reality. Rather, they think, ‘Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, I shall liberate all beings from cyclic existence!’ It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration.”
- 52.9 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of wisdom?”

- 52.10 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings dwell in the perfection of ethical discipline, they do not perceive anything at all as conditioned, they do not perceive anything at all as unconditioned, they do not perceive entities as conditioned, they do not perceive nonentities as unconditioned, they do not perceive signs as conditioned, and they do not perceive signlessness as unconditioned. They do not transgress the real nature of all phenomena, and apart from that they do not observe anything elsewhere as existent or nonexistent. Through this perfection of wisdom and skill in means, they do not regress to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of ethical discipline, acquire the perfection of wisdom.”
- 52.11 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of generosity?”
- 52.12 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, {Ki.V: 87} “when bodhisattva great beings dispense gifts, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment [F.79.a] until they are seated at the site of enlightenment, if all beings were to scold and reprimand them and even cut off their limbs and appendages, those bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, would think, ‘I shall dispense gifts to those beings! I will not desist from dispensing gifts to them!’ They give food to those beings who need food, drinks to those who need drinks, transport to those who need transport, clothing to those who need clothing, flowers to those who need flowers, garlands to those who need garlands, incense to those who need incense, unguents to those who need unguents, bedding to those who need bedding, sanctuary to those who need sanctuary, sustenance to those who need sustenance, up to and including all manner of things that are useful to human beings, to those who are in need of resources. Making common cause with all beings, they indeed dedicate those roots of virtuous action to all-aspect omniscience, and they make this dedication in such a way that by all means they do not resort to the threefold mental interaction between the one who makes the dedication, the dedication that is made, and the one to whom the dedication is made. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of generosity.”
- 52.13 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline?”
- 52.14 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment, will not deprive any being of life, will not steal, [F.79.b] will not commit sexual misconduct, will not tell lies, will not slander, will not speak words of reprimand, will not speak nonsensically, will not be covetous, will not be malicious, and will not resort to wrong views. Indeed, their minds will never engage with the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. They will also dedicate these roots of virtuous action, making common cause with all beings, toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they will make this dedication in such a way that by all means they do not resort to the threefold mental interaction between the one who makes the dedication, the dedication that is made, and the one to whom the dedication is made. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline.”

52.15 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of perseverance?” {Ki.V: 88}

52.16 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, would cultivate perseverance, saying, ‘After traveling for one yojana, a hundred yojanas, a thousand yojanas, a hundred thousand yojanas, ten million yojanas, and so on, up to a hundred billion trillion yojanas, through a hundred world systems, and so on, up to a hundred billion trillion world systems, I shall at least establish a few beings in the refuge or in the precepts. I shall establish them in [the level of eightfold] receptiveness, in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship, up to individual enlightenment, or unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ [F.80.a] They will also dedicate their roots of virtuous action, making common cause with all beings, toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of perseverance.”

52.17 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration?”

52.18 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, achieve and then maintain the first meditative concentration, which is free from the desires [of the senses], free from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, and endowed with ideation and scrutiny, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. They achieve and maintain the second meditative concentration. They achieve and maintain the third meditative concentration, and they achieve and maintain the fourth meditative concentration. They achieve and maintain [the formless absorptions], up to and including the absorption in cessation. They also dedicate all the attributes of mind and mental states that arise in association with the roots of virtuous action to all-aspect omniscience. At that time, they by all means make this dedication in such a way that the meditative concentrations and the branches of meditative concentration are not apprehended. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration.”

52.19 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, [F.80.b] acquire the perfection of wisdom?”

52.20 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “even though bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, survey and dwell in the principle of voidness, the principle of peace, the principle of the ending [of contaminants], and the principle of cessation with respect to all phenomena, they do not actualize reality until they are seated at the site of enlightenment. It is after they are seated at the site of enlightenment that they attain all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.V: 89} Then, arising from their seat [at the site of enlightenment], they turn the wheel of the Dharma. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of tolerance, acquire the perfection of wisdom. They acquire it in such a way that they do not abandon it and do not grasp it in any way.”

52.21 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of generosity?”

52.22 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, do not forsake perseverance by means of body or mind. They think, ‘There is no possibility that I will not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! I shall certainly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!’ For the sake of beings, they would travel one yojana, a hundred yojanas, a thousand yojanas, a hundred thousand yojanas, or through a single world system to anything up to one hundred billion trillion world systems. Abiding in the perfection of perseverance, they at least establish a single being in enlightenment. [F.81.a] Even if they do not encounter an individual who follows the vehicle of the bodhisattvas, they will establish an individual who follows the vehicle of the śrāvakas in the level of the śrāvakas. They will establish an individual who follows the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas in the level of the pratyekabuddhas. At the very least they will establish a single being in the paths of the ten virtuous actions. After imparting these gifts of the Dharma, they satisfy beings with material gifts, but they do not at all dedicate these roots of virtuous action to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Rather, making common cause with all beings, they make this dedication to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of generosity.”

52.23 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline?” {Ki.V:90}

52.24 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings think, ‘From the time when I first begin to set my mind on enlightenment until I am seated at the site of enlightenment, I shall indeed abstain from killing living creatures, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from killing living creatures. I shall praise abstention from killing living creatures, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from killing living creatures. I shall indeed abstain from stealing, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from stealing. I shall praise abstention from stealing, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from stealing. I [F.81.b] shall indeed abstain from sexual misconduct, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from sexual misconduct. I shall praise abstention from sexual misconduct, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from sexual misconduct. I shall indeed abstain from the telling of lies, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from the telling of lies. I shall praise abstention from the telling of lies, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from the telling of lies. I shall indeed abstain from slander, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from slander. I shall praise abstention from slander, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from slander. I shall indeed abstain from words of reprimand, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from words of reprimand. I shall praise abstention from words of reprimand, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from words of reprimand. I shall indeed abstain from nonsensical chatter, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from nonsensical chatter. I shall praise abstention from nonsensical chatter, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from nonsensical chatter. I shall indeed abstain from covetousness, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from covetousness. I shall praise abstention from covetousness, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from covetousness. I shall indeed abstain from malice, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from malice. [F.82.a] I shall praise abstention from malice, and I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from malice. I shall indeed abstain from wrong views, and I shall encourage others to keep abstaining from wrong views. I shall praise abstention from wrong views, {Ki.V:91} and

I shall praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from wrong views!’ Through this perfection of ethical discipline, they do not strive for the realm of desire, they do not strive for the realm of form, and they do not strive for the realm of formlessness. They do not strive for the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Rather, making common cause with all beings, they dedicate those roots of virtuous action toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they make this dedication in such a way that by all means they do not resort to the threefold mental interaction between the one who makes the dedication, the dedication that is made, and the one to whom the dedication is made. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline.”

52.25 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of tolerance?”

52.26 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if humans or nonhumans should disturb the minds of bodhisattva great beings, from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment, or even cut off all their limbs and appendages, [F.82.b] and depart carrying them off, those bodhisattva great beings who dwell in the perfection of perseverance would not think, ‘There is someone cutting me!’⁴⁸⁴ There is someone breaking me! There is someone carrying me off!’ Rather, they would think, ‘While I have acquired this body for their sake, they have approached me, cutting off my limbs and appendages and departed, carrying them off, so I will obtain an excellent benefit!’ They will focus their attention completely on the nature of reality. They will not dedicate their roots of virtuous action to the level of the śrāvakas or to the level of the pratyekabuddhas, but making common cause with all beings, they will dedicate them toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of tolerance.”

52.27 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration?”

52.28 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings achieve and then maintain the first meditative concentration, which is free from desires, free from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, and endowed with ideation and scrutiny, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. They achieve and then maintain the second meditative concentration when there is an intense inner clarity consequent on the calming of ideation and scrutiny—the absence of ideation and the absence of scrutiny being due to one-pointed mental focus—while the joy and bliss that arise from meditative stability are present. They achieve and then maintain the third meditative concentration free from joy, when one dwells in equanimity due to the absence of attachment to joy, while both mindfulness and alertness are present, [F.83.a] {Ki.V: 92} and bliss is still experienced by the body. This is what sublime beings describe as ‘mindful, abiding in bliss, and equanimous.’ They achieve and then maintain the fourth meditative concentration, when even that sense of bliss is abandoned and suffering has also been eliminated. Here, neither suffering nor bliss is present because even former blissful and unhappy states of mind have subsided, while equanimity and mindfulness are utterly pure. They maintain and then dwell in the immeasurable aspiration of loving kindness by focusing attention on the perception that beings should be happy. They maintain and then dwell in the immeasurable aspiration of compassion by focusing attention on the perception that beings should be free from suffering. They maintain and then dwell in the immeasurable aspiration of empathetic joy by focusing attention on the perception that beings should be joyful. They maintain and then dwell in the immeasurable aspiration of equanimity by focusing attention on the perception that beings should be free from [the dichotomy of] suffering and happiness. They maintain and then dwell in the sphere of infinite space by focusing attention on the perception that physical forms have largely been transcended and the perception that they have come to rest in space. They maintain and then dwell in the sphere of infinite consciousness by focusing attention on the perception that space has largely been transcended and the perception that it has come to rest in consciousness. They maintain and then dwell in the sphere of nothing-at-all by focusing attention on the perception that consciousness has largely been transcended and the perception that it has come to rest in nothing-at-all. They maintain and then dwell in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception by focusing attention on the perception that nothing-at-all has largely been transcended and the perception that it has come to rest in the state of neither perception nor nonperception. [F.83.b] However, they do not grasp the maturation of those meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, and formless absorptions. Rather, for the sake of beings, they will be reborn [in other realms] where they will bring beings to maturity in the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, and in all these six perfections. In order to cultivate the roots of virtuous action, they venerate the lord buddhas and move from buddhafiield to buddhafiield. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration.”

52.29 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of wisdom?”

52.30 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, do not observe the perfection of generosity as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, {Ki.V: 93} the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the emptiness of internal phenomena as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. [F.84.a] They do not observe the applications of mindfulness as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. They do not observe [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign. Since they do not observe anything as an entity, as a substance, or as a sign, they do not dwell in anything at all. They do as they say. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of perseverance, acquire the perfection of wisdom.”

52.31 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of generosity?” [F.84.b]

52.32 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings achieve and then maintain the first meditative concentration, which is free from the desires [of the senses], free from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, and endowed with ideation and scrutiny, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. They achieve and then maintain the second meditative concentration when there is an intense inner clarity consequent on the calming of ideation and scrutiny—the absence of ideation and the absence of scrutiny being due to one-pointed mental focus—while the joy and bliss that arise from meditative stability are present. They achieve and then maintain the third meditative concentration free from joy, abiding in equanimity due to the absence of attachment to joy, while both mindfulness and alertness are present, and bliss is still experienced by the body. This is what sublime beings describe as ‘mindful, abiding in bliss, and equanimous.’ They achieve and then maintain the fourth meditative concentration, when even that sense of bliss is abandoned and suffering has also been eliminated. Here, neither suffering nor bliss is present because even former blissful and unhappy states of mind have subsided, while equanimity and mindfulness are utterly pure. {Ki.V: 94} They also achieve and then maintain [the immeasurable attitudes and the formless absorptions], up to and including the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Abiding in this perfection of meditative concentration, with an undistracted mind, they dispense the gift of the Dharma, and also material gifts, to beings, and they encourage others to keep dispensing the gift of the Dharma and material gifts. They also praise the gift of the Dharma and material gifts, and they praise and take empathetic delight in others dispensing the gift of the Dharma and material gifts. [F.85.a] They do not dedicate these roots of virtuous action to the level of the śrāvakas or to the level of the pratyekabuddhas, but making common cause with all beings, they dedicate them toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of generosity.”

52.33 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline?”

52.34 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, do not develop thoughts of desire. They do not develop thoughts of hatred, delusion, or violence. Rather, they practice as they focus their attention on all-aspect omniscience. They do not dedicate these roots of virtuous action to the level of the śrāvakas or to the level of the pratyekabuddhas, but, making common cause with all beings, they dedicate them toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline.”

52.35 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of tolerance?”

52.36 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, [F.85.b] “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, discern physical forms as resembling foam. They discern feelings as resembling a water bubble, perceptions as resembling a mirage, formative predispositions as resembling a hollow plantain, and consciousness as resembling a magical display. When making such discernments, they maintain the perception that these five aggregates of appropriation are essenceless, thinking, ‘Even though my limbs and appendages are being cut off, who is doing the cutting and who is being cut? {Ki.V: 95} Whose is this body? Whose are these feelings? Whose are these perceptions? Whose are these formative predispositions? Whose is this consciousness?’ When they discern in that manner, they then think, ‘When someone is being criticized and reprimanded, who is being scolded and reprimanded, giving rise to such malicious thoughts?’ It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of tolerance.” [B58]

52.37 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of perseverance?”

52.38 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, achieve and then maintain the first meditative concentration, which is free from the desires [of the senses], free from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, and endowed with ideation and scrutiny, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. They achieve and then maintain the second meditative concentration when there is an intense inner clarity consequent on the calming of ideation and scrutiny— [F.86.a] the absence of ideation and the absence of scrutiny being due to one-pointed mental focus—while the joy and bliss that arise from meditative stability are present. They achieve and then maintain the third meditative concentration free from joy, abiding in equanimity due to the absence of attachment to joy, while both mindfulness and alertness are present, and bliss is still experienced by the body. This is what sublime beings describe as ‘mindful, abiding in bliss, and equanimous.’ They achieve and then maintain the fourth meditative concentration, when even that sense of bliss is abandoned and suffering has also been eliminated. Here, neither suffering nor bliss is present because even former blissful and unhappy states of mind have subsided, while equanimity and mindfulness are utterly pure. And yet, they do not grasp these meditative concentrations and ancillary aspects of meditative concentration as signs or mental concepts. Since their minds are endowed with such absorption, they experience many facets of miraculous ability. They may even cause this mighty earth to shake. Having been singular [in form], they can become multiple, and having been multiple [in form], they can become singular. They may also experience themselves as visible and as invisible. They can move directly through walls. They can move directly through enclosures. They can move directly through mountains, unimpededly, as if in space. They can also move through space like a bird. They can hover above the earth and sink below it, as if in water. They can walk on water, without sinking, as if on solid ground. They can also emit smoke and blaze as fire, like a great conflagration. However miraculous, powerful, and mighty the sun and the moon might be, they can stroke them with their hands. [F.86.b] They can even outshine [the god realms], up to and including the Brahmā realms, with their physical bodies.

52.39 “Since they have pure divine clairaudience, which surpasses the hearing of human beings, they can hear the voices of gods and humans, near or far. They can correctly know with their own minds the minds of other beings and the minds of other persons, exactly as they are. That is to say, they correctly know minds that are afflicted with desire as minds that are afflicted with desire, and they correctly know [other mindsets],⁴⁸⁵ up to and including minds that are unsurpassed, as minds that are unsurpassed [and so forth].

52.40 “They can recollect many facets of past lives. That is to say, they may recollect anything from a single thought up to even a hundred thoughts. They may recollect [any period of time], up to and including a single eon, and they may even recollect anything from that up to and including a hundred eons. They may even recollect [any any period], up to and including many hundred billion trillions of eons, thinking, ‘Such was I [in that life]. Such was my name. Such was my family. Such was my social class. Such was the food I ate. Such was the duration of my life. Such was the extent of my lifespan. Deceased from there, I transmigrated and was born as so-and-so, and then dying there and transmigrating, I have been reborn here!’ To that extent, they can recollect in many details their own past lives and those of others, along with their circumstances, causal bases, and evidence. They can correctly know through their pure clairvoyance surpassing the vision of humans those beings who are dying and transmigrating, and those who are reborn, and then proceed to other realms in accordance with their past actions.

52.41 “Abiding in these five extrasensory powers, in order to venerate, question, and counter-question the lord buddhas, to develop the roots of virtuous action, and also to bring beings to maturation [F.87.a] and refine the buddhafiels, they move from buddhafiels to buddhafiels. {Ki.V: 96} They do not dedicate these roots of virtuous action to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, but making common cause with all beings, dedicate them toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. And they make this dedication in such a way that by all means they do not resort to the threefold mental interaction between the one who makes the dedication, the dedication that is made, and the one to whom the dedication is made. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of perseverance.”

52.42 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, acquire the perfection of wisdom?”

52.43 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, do not apprehend physical forms. They do not apprehend feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not apprehend the eyes, and they do not apprehend the ears, nose, tongue, body, or mental faculty. They do not apprehend sights, and they do not apprehend sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, or mental phenomena. They do not apprehend visual consciousness, and they do not apprehend [the other aspects of consciousness], up to and including mental consciousness. They do not apprehend visually compounded sensory contact, and they do not apprehend [the other aspects of sensory contact], up to and including mentally compounded sensory contact. They do not apprehend feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact, and they do not apprehend [the other aspects of feelings conditioned by sensory contact], up to and including feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact. They do not apprehend the earth element, and they do not apprehend [the other elements], up to and including the consciousness element. They do not apprehend ignorance, [F.87.b] and they do not apprehend [the other links of dependent origination], up to and including aging and death. They do not apprehend the perfection of generosity, and they do not apprehend the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They do not apprehend the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they do not apprehend [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not apprehend the applications of mindfulness, and they do not apprehend the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They do not apprehend the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not apprehend [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They do not apprehend conditioned elements, and they do not apprehend unconditioned elements. Since, in that manner, they do not apprehend anything, they do not condition anything at all. Since they do not condition anything at all, they neither cause anything to arise, nor do they cause anything to cease. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because, whether the tathāgatas have appeared or not, the presence of all phenomena continues to be present, and the realm of phenomena similarly continues to be present, and so there is neither arising nor ceasing. Bodhisattva great beings, with undistracted minds, [F.88.a] never part from directing their minds to all-aspect omniscience. It is in this way, Subhūti, that, abiding in the perfection of meditative concentration, they acquire the perfection of wisdom.”

52.44 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of generosity?” {Ki.V: 97}

52.45 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not observe the notion that all phenomena are empty.”

52.46 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they not observe the notion that all phenomena are empty?”

52.47 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not apprehend the emptiness of internal phenomena as the emptiness of internal phenomena. They do not apprehend the emptiness of external phenomena as the emptiness of external phenomena. They do not apprehend the emptiness of external and internal phenomena as the emptiness of external and internal phenomena. They do not apprehend the emptiness of emptiness as the emptiness of emptiness. They do not apprehend the emptiness of great extent as the emptiness of great extent. They do not apprehend the emptiness of ultimate reality as the emptiness of ultimate reality. They do not apprehend the emptiness of conditioned phenomena as the emptiness of conditioned phenomena. They do not apprehend the emptiness of unconditioned phenomena as the emptiness of unconditioned phenomena. They do not apprehend the emptiness of the unlimited as the emptiness of the unlimited. [F.88.b] They do not apprehend the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end as the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end. They do not apprehend the emptiness of nonexclusion as the emptiness of nonexclusion. They do not apprehend the emptiness of inherent existence as the emptiness of inherent existence. They do not apprehend the emptiness of all phenomena as the emptiness of all phenomena. They do not apprehend the emptiness of all intrinsic defining characteristics as the emptiness of all intrinsic defining characteristics. Abiding in these fourteen aspects of emptiness, bodhisattva great beings do not apprehend the notion that physical forms are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. Similarly, they do not apprehend the notion that the applications of mindfulness are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty, or that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that all the perfections and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. [F.89.a] They do not apprehend the notion that conditioned elements are empty, or the notion that they are not empty. They do not apprehend the notion that unconditioned elements are empty, or the notion that they are not empty.

52.48 “Practicing this perfection of wisdom accordingly, even though they dispense their gifts of food, drink, transport, clothing, flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, bedding, sanctuary, sustenance, resources, or whatever is of use to human beings, they do not observe the notion that these gifts are empty, [or the notion that they are not empty]. Nor do they observe the notion that the one who dispenses these gifts and the one to whom they are dispensed are empty or the notion that they are not empty. In that regard there is no occasion for miserliness or acquisitiveness. If you ask why, for bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, all such notions will not arise, {Ki.V: 98} from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, until they are seated at the site of enlightenment. Just as the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas who attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment are never miserly or acquisitive, so also for bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom thoughts of miserliness or acquisitiveness do not arise. This actual perfection of wisdom is the teacher of bodhisattva great beings. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of generosity.” [F.89.b]

52.49 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline?”

52.50 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, have no occasion to be associated with the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, it is because they do not apprehend even the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, nor indeed do they apprehend such thoughts. From the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment, they abstain from killing living creatures, and encourage others also to keep abstaining from killing living creatures. They praise abstention from killing living creatures, and they praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from killing living creatures. They themselves abstain from stealing, sexual misconduct, the telling of lies, slander, words of reprimand, nonsensical chatter, covetousness, malice, and wrong views, and they encourage others also to keep abstaining from wrong views [and so forth]. They praise abstention from wrong views [and so forth], and they praise and take empathetic delight in others abstaining from wrong views [and so forth]. Through this ethical discipline, since they are not attached even to the attributes of the śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas, how much less to any other. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of ethical discipline.” {Ki.V: 99}

52.51 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, [F.90.a] abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of tolerance?”

52.52 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “while bodhisattva great beings dwell in the perfection of wisdom, there is a corresponding patient acceptance that arises, and they think, ‘There is nothing at all here that arises, ceases, originates, or perishes, and nothing that is fettered, reprimanded, rebuked, cut, pierced, or injured.’ Therefore, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment, if all beings were to approach them and reprimand or rebuke them, hitting them with stones and clubs, striking them with weapons, or even cutting off [their limbs], in that case they would think, ‘Oh, how wonderful is this, the reality of all phenomena! In this [reality], there is nothing at all that is reprimanded, rebuked, cut, pierced, injured, or fettered.’ It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of tolerance.”

52.53 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of perseverance?”

52.54 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, maintain the four supports for miraculous ability. With skill in means they develop physical and mental perseverance, traversing a single world system, a hundred world systems, a thousand world systems, [F.90.b] or anything up to a hundred billion trillion world systems, and they teach the Dharma to beings, establishing them in the perfection of generosity, and establishing them in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They establish beings in the applications of mindfulness, and in [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path. They establish them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. They establish them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but in such a way that they are by no means secured in conditioned elements or in unconditioned elements. {Ki.V: 100} It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of perseverance.”

52.55 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration?”

52.56 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, may become absorbed in the meditative stabilities of the śrāvakas, in the meditative stabilities of the pratyekabuddhas, or in the meditative stabilities of the bodhisattvas—in all those meditative stabilities except the meditative stabilities of the tathāgatas. Abiding in those meditative stabilities, [F.91.a] they may become absorbed in and arise from the eight aspects of liberation, either sequentially or in reverse order. If you ask what are these eight, Subhūti, they are as follows: The first aspect of liberation ensues when bodhisattva great beings as corporeal beings observe physical forms. The second aspect of liberation ensues when formless beings endowed with internal perception observe external physical forms. The third aspect of liberation ensues when beings are inclined toward pleasant states. The fourth aspect of liberation ensues when the perceptions of physical forms have been completely transcended in all respects, when the perceptions of obstructed phenomena have subsided, and the mind does not engage with diverse perceptions, so that one achieves and dwells in the sphere of infinite space, thinking, ‘Space is infinite.’ The fifth aspect of liberation ensues when the sphere of infinite space has been completely transcended in all respects, and one achieves and dwells in the sphere of infinite consciousness, thinking, ‘Consciousness is infinite.’ The sixth aspect of liberation ensues when the sphere of infinite consciousness has been completely transcended in all respects, and one achieves and dwells in the sphere of nothing-at-all, thinking, ‘There is nothing at all.’ The seventh aspect of liberation ensues when the sphere of nothing-at-all has been completely transcended in all respects, and one achieves and dwells in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. The eighth aspect of liberation ensues when the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception has been completely transcended in all respects, and one achieves and dwells in the cessation of all perceptions and feelings. They may become absorbed in and arise from these eight aspects of liberation, [F.91.b] both sequentially and in the reverse order.⁴⁸⁶

52.57 “Similarly, they may become absorbed in and arise from the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, either sequentially or in reverse order. If you ask what are these nine, Subhūti, they are as follows: (1) Bodhisattva great beings achieve and maintain the first meditative concentration, which is free from the desires [of the senses], free from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, and endowed with ideation {Ki.V: 101} and scrutiny, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. (2) They achieve and maintain the second meditative concentration when there is an intense inner clarity consequent on the calming of ideation and scrutiny—the absence of ideation and the absence of scrutiny being due to one-pointed mental focus—while the joy and bliss that arise from meditative stability are present. (3) They achieve and maintain the third meditative concentration free from joy, abiding in equanimity due to the absence of attachment to joy, while both mindfulness and alertness are present, and bliss is still experienced by the body. This is what sublime beings describe as ‘mindful, abiding in bliss, and equanimous.’ (4) They achieve and maintain the fourth meditative concentration, when even that sense of bliss is abandoned, and suffering has also been eliminated. Here, neither suffering nor bliss is present because even former blissful and unhappy states of mind have subsided, while equanimity and mindfulness are utterly pure. (5) They achieve and maintain the sphere of infinite space when the perceptions of physical forms have been completely transcended in all respects, the perceptions of obstructed phenomena have subsided, the mind does not engage with diverse perceptions, and they thereby think, ‘Space is infinite.’ (6) They achieve and maintain the sphere of infinite consciousness when the sphere of infinite space has been completely transcended in all respects, and they think, ‘Consciousness is infinite.’ [F.92.a] (7) They achieve and maintain the sphere of nothing-at-all when the sphere of infinite consciousness has been completely transcended in all respects, and they think, ‘There is nothing at all.’ (8) They achieve and maintain the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception when the sphere of nothing-at-all has been completely transcended in all respects. (9) They achieve and maintain the cessation of all perceptions and feelings when the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception has been completely transcended in all respects.⁴⁸⁷ They may become absorbed in and arise from these nine serial steps of meditative absorption, both sequentially and in the reverse order.

52.58 “After differentiating these eight aspects of liberation and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, they may become absorbed in the meditative stability known as the yawning lion. {Ki.V: 102} Subhūti, if you ask what is the meditative stability known as the yawning lion, which bodhisattva great beings may experience, at this point, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings will have achieved and maintained the first meditative concentration, where there is freedom from desires, and freedom from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, while ideation and scrutiny are present, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. They then arise from that first meditative concentration and become absorbed in the second meditative concentration. They then arise from that second meditative concentration and become absorbed in the third meditative concentration. They then arise from that third meditative concentration and become absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration. They then arise from that fourth meditative concentration and become absorbed in the sphere of infinite space. They then arise from that sphere of infinite space and [F.92.b] become absorbed in the sphere of infinite consciousness. They then arise from that sphere of infinite consciousness and become absorbed in the sphere of nothing-at-all. They then arise from that sphere of nothing-at-all and become absorbed in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. They then arise from that sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, and become absorbed in cessation. And then, [in reverse order], they arise from absorption in cessation, and become absorbed in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. They then arise from that sphere of neither perception nor nonperception and become absorbed in the sphere of nothing-at-all. They then arise from that sphere of nothing-at-all and become absorbed in the sphere of infinite consciousness. They then arise from that sphere of infinite consciousness and become absorbed in the sphere of infinite space. They then arise from that sphere of infinite space and become absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration. They then arise from that fourth meditative concentration and become absorbed in the third meditative concentration. They then arise from that third meditative concentration and become absorbed in the second meditative concentration. They then arise from that second meditative concentration and become absorbed in the first meditative concentration.

52.59 “After maturing this meditative stability of the yawning lion, they then become absorbed in the all-surpassing meditative stability. Subhūti, if you ask what is the all-surpassing meditative stability that bodhisattva great beings experience, {Ki.V: 103} in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings will have achieved and maintained the first meditative concentration, where there is freedom from desires, and freedom from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, while ideation and scrutiny are present, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. Then, arising from that first meditative concentration, [F.93.a] they achieve and maintain the second meditative concentration. Then, arising from that second meditative concentration, they achieve and maintain the third meditative concentration. Then, arising from that third meditative concentration, they achieve and maintain the fourth meditative concentration. Then, arising from that fourth meditative concentration, they achieve and maintain absorption in the sphere of infinite space. Then, arising from that absorption in the sphere of infinite space, they achieve and maintain absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness. Then, arising from that absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, they achieve and maintain absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all. Then, arising from that absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, they achieve and maintain absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Then, arising from that absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, they achieve and maintain the cessation of perceptions and feelings.

52.60 “And then, [in reverse order], they arise from that absorption in cessation, and become absorbed in the first meditative concentration. Then, arising from the first meditative concentration, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the second meditative concentration. Then, arising from the second meditative concentration, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the third meditative concentration. Then, arising from the third meditative concentration, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. [F.93.b] Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration. Then, arising from the fourth meditative concentration, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of infinite space. Then, arising from the absorption of the sphere of infinite space, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness. Then, arising from the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all. Then, arising from the absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they become absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Then, arising from the absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they engage with the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the absorption of cessation. Then, arising from the absorption of cessation, they dwell in the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, [F.94.a] they become absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Then, arising from that absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, they dwell in the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, {Ki.V: 104} they become absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all. Then, arising from that absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all, they dwell in the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the sphere of infinite consciousness. Then, arising from that absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, they dwell in the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the sphere of infinite space. Then, arising from that sphere of infinite space, they dwell in the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration. Then, arising from that fourth meditative concentration, they engage with the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the third meditative concentration. Then, arising from that third meditative concentration, they engage with the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the second meditative concentration. Then, arising from that second meditative concentration, they engage with the state of nonabsorbed mind. Then, arising from that state of nonabsorbed mind, they become absorbed in the first meditative concentration. Then, arising from that first meditative concentration, they engage with the state of nonabsorbed mind. [F.94.b] Abiding in this all-surpassing meditative stability, they attain the sameness of all phenomena. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, abiding in the perfection of wisdom, acquire the perfection of meditative concentration.”

CHAPTER 53

53.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, for how long have bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means set out [on this path]?”

“Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means have set out [on this path] for countless billion trillions of eons,” replied the Blessed One.

53.2 “Blessed Lord, how many buddhas have those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means revered?”

“Subhūti, you should know that those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means have revered as many buddhas as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā,” replied the Blessed One.

53.3 “Blessed Lord, what are the roots of virtuous action that those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means have cultivated?”

The Blessed One replied, “Starting from the time when they first began to set their mind on enlightenment, there is no notion at all of any such perfection of generosity that those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means have not completed. There is no notion at all of any such perfection of ethical discipline, [F.95.a] perfection of tolerance, perfection of perseverance, perfection of meditative concentration, or perfection of wisdom that those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means have not completed.”

53.4 “Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means are most wonderful!” {Ki.V: 51}

“It is so, Subhūti! It is so!” replied the Blessed One. “Those bodhisattva great beings who possess such skill in means are most wonderful! Subhūti, just as the orb of the sun and the orb of the moon have an impact upon the four continents, follow the four continents, and move around the four continents, in the same way, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom has an impact upon the other five perfections. It follows the other five perfections and moves around them. It is because they are inseparable from the perfection of wisdom that the other five perfections acquire the designation perfection. If they were without the perfection of wisdom, the other five perfections would not acquire the designation perfection.

53.5 “Subhūti, just as without an imperial monarch, the seven precious insignia of royal dominion would not acquire the designation imperial,⁴⁸⁹ in the same way, Subhūti, if they were without the perfection of wisdom, the other five perfections would not acquire the designation perfection.

53.6 “Subhūti, just as it is easy for promiscuous men to harm women without a husband, in the same way, Subhūti, if they were without the perfection of wisdom, it would be easy for those other five perfections to be harmed by Māra or by gods in the realm of Māra. Subhūti, just as promiscuous men cannot harm a woman staying in an excellent household, [F.95.b] protected by a strong husband, in the same way, Subhūti, if they are not without the perfection of wisdom, it will not be easy for those other five perfections to be harmed by Māra or by gods in the realm of Māra.

53.7 “Subhūti, it is just as when a man goes out to battle dressed in full armor and stands in the face of battle, struck by all sorts of weapons, and it is difficult for hostile kings, assailants, or enemies to conquer him. In the same way, Subhūti, if they are not without the perfection of wisdom, it will be difficult for those other five perfections to be conquered by Māra or by gods in the realm of Māra, by individuals of overweening pride, or even by outcaste bodhisattvas.

53.8 “Subhūti, just as regional kings succumb to an imperial monarch, and approach to act in his service, in the same way, Subhūti, if the five other perfections have been retained by the perfection of wisdom, they will proceed into the presence of all-aspect omniscience.

53.9 “Subhūti, just as all tributaries that there are flow into the great river Gaṅgā, and along with the river Gaṅgā, flow into the great ocean, in the same way, Subhūti, if the five other perfections have been retained by the perfection of wisdom, they will proceed into the presence of all-aspect omniscience.

53.10 “Subhūti, just as a person’s right hand performs all sorts of functions, in the same way, Subhūti, is the perfection of wisdom to be regarded—the other five perfections being comparable with the left hand. {Ki.V: 52}

53.11 “Subhūti, just as all the water that there is, including the water of tributaries and the water of wide rivers, flows into an ocean, [F.96.a] so that it becomes salty to taste and of a single savor, in the same way, Subhūti, if the five other perfections have been retained by the perfection of wisdom, when they proceed to all-aspect omniscience, they will become of a single savor, in the taste of all-aspect omniscience.

- 53.12 “Subhūti, it is just as the precious wheel, [the standard of royal dominion], proceeds and stays in the vanguard of the army of an imperial monarch, with its four corps—such that in the place where the imperial monarch halts to partake of food, all the armed forces of that imperial monarch are refreshed and do not move while [the standard of] the precious wheel remains there. In the same way, Subhūti, these five other perfections have been led by the perfection of wisdom. They proceed into the presence of all-aspect omniscience and remain there. Having halted there, they do not cease to remain there.
- 53.13 “Subhūti, just as [the seven insignia of royal dominion] belonging to an imperial monarch—the precious wheel, the precious minister, the precious householder, the precious queen consort, the precious gem, the precious elephant, and the precious horse—proceed in the vanguard of an army with its four divisions, in the same way, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom also proceeds in the vanguard of these five other perfections. Proceeding in the vanguard, it then halts in the presence of all-aspect omniscience. The perfection of wisdom does not then think, ‘May the perfection of generosity follow, outside of me.’ It does not think, ‘May the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, and the perfection of meditative concentration follow, outside of me.’ [F.96.b] Furthermore, the perfection of generosity does not think, ‘I will follow the perfection of wisdom.’ The perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, and the perfection of meditative concentration do not think, ‘I will follow the perfection of wisdom.’ If you ask why, this is their nature. They are incapable of anything, empty of essential nature and vacuous, like a mirage.”
- 53.14 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are naturally empty, in that case, Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of generosity, and who practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”
- 53.15 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, they think, ‘Alas! This world system has resorted to erroneous thought. These [beings] cannot extricate themselves from cyclic existence owing to their lack of skill in means, but I will now practice the perfection of generosity for the sake of these beings! I will practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and [F.97.a] the perfection of wisdom [for their sake].’ {Ki.V: 53} Then, for the sake of those beings, they dispense outer and inner possessions, and when they dispense those possessions, they think, 'I have not dispensed anything at all. If you ask why, it is because these phenomena are themselves perishable.' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who reflect in that manner fulfill the perfection of generosity.

53.16 "For the sake of those beings, they offer no opportunity for degenerate morality. If you ask why, it is because they think, 'Now that I have set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I do not resemble those who kill living creatures, steal, commit sexual misconduct, tell lies, slander, speak words of reprimand, resort to nonsensical chatter, are covetous, indulge in malice, resort to wrong views, or who aspire toward objects, or aspire to deities, to Brahmā, or to the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas.' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who reflect in that manner practice the perfection of ethical discipline.

53.17 "For the sake of those same beings, their minds are unagitated even when they are always scolded and rebuked with harsh and coarse words. Thoughts of hatred do not arise even when they are struck and pierced with stones, clubs, clods of earth, or weapons, or when their limbs are cut off, or their appendages severed. If you ask why, it is because they reflect that all words are like an echo, and all forms are like a mass of foam. Subhūti, [F.97.b] bodhisattva great beings who reflect in that manner practice the perfection of tolerance.

53.18 "For the sake of those same beings, in order that they might seek out all the roots of virtuous action, they do not cultivate thoughts of idleness. If you ask why, it is because they think, 'If it is hard on account of idleness to find even a rebirth in the exalted realms, how much more so in the case of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Therefore, I will undertake perseverance until I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! I shall never desist from persevering in it!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who reflect in that manner practice the perfection of perseverance.

53.19 "For the sake of those same beings, their minds are unagitated. If you ask why, it is because they think, 'If it is hard on account of agitation to find a rebirth in the [realms of] mundane meditative concentration, how much more in the case of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Therefore, I will not be agitated until I have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who reflect in that manner practice the perfection of meditative concentration.

53.20 "For the sake of those same beings, they will never be separated from the perfection of wisdom until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they think, 'Without setting out on the perfection of wisdom, beings cannot be brought to maturity by any other means. Therefore, I [F.98.a] will not entertain even the slightest thought of stupidity.' Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who reflect in that manner practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of beings."

53.21 "Blessed Lord, if the perfections are not different, how is it that this perfection of wisdom is, with respect to the five other perfections, said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled?"

53.22 "Subhūti, it is so! It is so!" replied the Blessed One. "Subhūti, there is no difference at all in the perfections. But if there were no perfection of wisdom, these five other perfections too would not acquire the name perfection. It is dependent on the perfection of wisdom that these five other perfections indeed acquire the name perfection."

53.23 "Subhūti, just as different corporeal forms on approaching Mount Sumeru become of a single complexion, {Ki.V: 54} in the same way, Subhūti, these five other perfections acquire the name perfection dependent on the perfection of wisdom. When they proceed to all-aspect omniscience, they will become of a single hue—the hue of all-aspect omniscience. They are without distinctions, such as, 'This is the perfection of generosity! This is the perfection of ethical discipline! This is the perfection of tolerance! This is the perfection of perseverance! This is the perfection of meditative concentration! This is the perfection of wisdom!' [F.98.b] If you ask why, they are without distinctions because they are without essential nature."

53.24 "Blessed Lord, if in that way there are no distinctions and no particulars with respect to anything at all that is to be objectively established, why then is the perfection of wisdom, in relation to the five other perfections, said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled?"

53.25 "Subhūti, it is so! It is so," replied the Blessed One. "There is nothing at all with particulars or distinctions that is to be objectively established. In mundane and symbolic terms, in order to extricate beings from cyclic existence, the perfection of generosity does indeed exist, and the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom do indeed exist. But these beings are without birth, without death, without transmigration, and without origination. You should know that since beings are nonexistent, all phenomena are nonexistent. For this reason, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom, in relation to the five other perfections, is said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled. Subhūti, this is just as among all the women of Jambudvīpa, the precious queen consort is said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, [F.99.a] said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled.”

53.26 “Blessed Lord, through what intention is the perfection of wisdom said to be the best, said to be foremost, said to be supreme, said to be sacred, said to be perfect, {Ki.V: 55} said to be sublime, said to be unsurpassed, said to be highest, said to be unequaled, and said to be equal to the unequaled?”

“Subhūti, it is because this perfection of wisdom retains all virtuous attributes and dwells in the presence of all-aspect omniscience, in a nondwelling manner,” replied the Blessed One.

53.27 “Blessed Lord, does the perfection of wisdom acquire or relinquish anything at all?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. “The perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish anything at all. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because all phenomena are neither acquired nor relinquished.”

53.28 “Blessed Lord, with respect to what does the perfection of wisdom neither acquire nor relinquish anything?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish physical forms. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish the perfections, [F.99.b] any aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom does not acquire or relinquish [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

53.29 “Blessed Lord, how are physical forms neither acquired nor relinquished? How are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness neither acquired nor relinquished? How are [all the causal and fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, neither acquired nor relinquished?”

53.30 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is through nonattention to physical forms that physical forms are neither acquired nor relinquished. It is through nonattention to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness that consciousness [and so forth] are neither acquired nor relinquished. It is through nonattention to the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are neither acquired nor relinquished. It is through nonattention to the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are neither acquired nor relinquished. [F.100.a] It is through nonattention to the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, {Ki.V: 56} the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are neither acquired nor relinquished. It is through nonattention to the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are neither acquired nor relinquished. It is through nonattention to [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are neither acquired nor relinquished. Subhūti, it is in this way that physical forms are neither acquired nor relinquished, and that [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither acquired nor relinquished.”

53.31 “Blessed Lord, if one does not focus attention on physical forms; does not focus attention on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; does not focus attention on the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; does not focus attention on all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; does not focus attention on the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; does not focus attention on the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, [F.100.b] the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and does not focus attention on [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, how then, Blessed Lord, will the roots of virtuous action increase without attention being focused on physical forms; without attention being focused on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; without attention being focused on the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; without attention being focused on all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; without attention being focused on the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; without attention being focused on the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and without attention being focused on [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience? How will the six perfections be fulfilled without the roots of virtuous action even increasing? How will all-aspect omniscience be attained without even the six perfections being fulfilled?"

53.32 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "when bodhisattva great beings do not focus attention on physical forms; do not focus attention on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; do not focus attention on the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; do not focus attention on any perfections, any aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; do not focus attention on the truths of the noble ones, [F.101.a] the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; do not focus attention on the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and do not focus attention on [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, at that time, the roots of virtuous action will increase, so that the six perfections will be fulfilled. The six perfections will be fulfilled, so that all-aspect omniscience will be attained. If you ask why, it is through nonattention to physical forms; {Ki.V: 57} nonattention to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; nonattention to the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; nonattention to any perfections, any aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; nonattention to the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and nonattention to the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.” [F.101.b]

53.33 “Why is it that by not focusing attention on physical forms; not focusing attention on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions; or consciousness; and similarly not focusing attention on the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; and similarly not focusing attention on any perfections, any aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; and similarly not focusing attention on the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; and similarly not focusing attention on the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and not focusing attention on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment they will attain all-aspect omniscience?” [B59]

53.34 The Blessed One replied, “Whether it is in the realm of desire that [beings] are fixated, or in the realm of form or the realm of formlessness, this occurs owing to the focusing of attention. They will not be fixated through nonattention. Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they should not be fixated on anything at all.”

53.35 “Blessed Lord, in what do those bodhisattva great beings who accordingly practice the perfection of wisdom dwell?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who accordingly practice the perfection of wisdom do not dwell in physical forms. [F.102.a] They do not dwell in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not dwell in the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. They do not dwell in any perfections, any aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They do not dwell in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not dwell in the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not dwell in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

53.36 “Blessed Lord, why do they not dwell even in all-aspect omniscience?”
{Ki.V:58}

“They do not dwell in anything because they are without fixation,” replied the Blessed One. “If you ask why, it is because they do not observe anything at all on which they should be fixated or in which they should dwell. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom without fixation and in a nondwelling manner. If, on the other hand, bodhisattva great beings were to think, ‘Anyone who practices in that manner and cultivates in that manner is practicing the perfection of wisdom, and will cultivate the perfection of wisdom. I am practicing the perfection of wisdom. I will cultivate the perfection of wisdom’— [F.102.b] if they were to have such notions, they would be remote from the perfection of wisdom. Those who are remote from the perfection of wisdom are remote from the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity. They are remote from the emptiness of internal phenomena. They are remote from [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They are remote from the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They are remote from the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They are remote from the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They are remote from [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, the perfection of wisdom is not fixated on anything at all. In the perfection of wisdom there is no fixation at all. If you ask why, it is because any such thing on which it might be fixated is without inherent existence.

53.37 “Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings were even to perceive the perfection of wisdom, [F.103.a] those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Those who degenerate from the perfection of wisdom degenerate from all phenomena. Even if they were to think, ‘The perfection of wisdom acquires the five other perfections,’ those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Even if they were to think, 'The perfection of wisdom acquires the emptiness of internal phenomena,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Even if they were to think, 'The perfection of wisdom acquires [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Even if they were to think, 'The perfection of wisdom acquires the foundations of mindfulness. The perfection of wisdom acquires [the other causal attributes], up to and including the noble eightfold path,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Even if they were to think, 'The perfection of wisdom acquires the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Even if they were to think, 'The perfection of wisdom acquires the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [F.103.b] and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Even if they were to think, 'The perfection of wisdom acquires [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. Bereft of the perfection of wisdom, they could not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

53.38 "Even if they were to think, 'Abiding in this perfection of wisdom, one will be prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment,' those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom, and those who degenerate from the perfection of wisdom are not prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

53.39 "If they were to think, 'Abiding in this perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings will actualize the perfection of generosity, and they will actualize the perfection of ethical discipline, {Ki.V: 59} the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They will actualize the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they will actualize [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They will actualize the applications of mindfulness, and they will actualize the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They will actualize the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.104.a] the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They will actualize the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [great loving kindness], great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas,' even in that case those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, those who have degenerated from the perfection of wisdom cannot actualize the perfection of generosity. They cannot actualize the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. They cannot actualize the emptiness of internal phenomena. They cannot actualize [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They cannot actualize the applications of mindfulness. They cannot actualize the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They cannot actualize the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. [F.104.b] They cannot actualize the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.

53.40 "If they were to think, 'The tathāgatas have acquired all attributes. After attaining consummate buddhahood of their own accord, they have explained, taught, and disclosed them,' even in that case those bodhisattva great beings would degenerate from the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, the tathāgatas do not attain consummate buddhahood with respect to anything at all. Indeed, Subhūti, since the tathāgatas do not conceive of anything at all, how could they possibly attain consummate buddhahood with respect to anything. That would be impossible."

53.41 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, "Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom avoid these faults?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they practice correctly, cognizing, 'All phenomena are nonexistent and cannot be acquired. One cannot attain consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena that are nonexistent and cannot be acquired,' then they do practice the perfection of wisdom. But if they are fixated on the impossibility of anything being acquired, those bodhisattva great beings are bereft of the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, the perfection of wisdom is not expressed through fixation.” {Ki.V: 60} [F.105.a]

53.42 “Blessed Lord, is the perfection of wisdom not bereft of the perfection of wisdom? Are the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity not bereft of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]? Is the emptiness of internal phenomena not bereft of the emptiness of internal phenomena? Are [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, not bereft of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]? Are the applications of mindfulness not bereft of the applications of mindfulness? Are the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path not bereft of the noble eightfold path [and so forth]? Are the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways not bereft of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]? Are the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas not bereft of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]? Are [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, not bereft of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]?”

53.43 “If indeed it were the case that the perfection of wisdom is not bereft of the perfection of wisdom; that the perfection of meditative concentration, [F.105.b] the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are not bereft of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]; and that [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not bereft of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], how then would the perfection of wisdom be brought into being? How would the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity be brought into being? How would [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, be brought into being?”

53.44 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they are not fixated on the notions of ‘physical forms,’ ‘these physical forms,’ or ‘their physical forms.’”

They are not fixated on the notions of 'feelings,' 'perceptions,' 'formative predispositions,' or 'consciousness'; 'this consciousness' [and so forth]; or 'their consciousness' [and so forth]. They are not fixated on the notions of 'the sense fields,' 'the sensory elements,' or 'the links of dependent origination'; 'these links of dependent origination' [and so forth]; or 'their links of dependent origination' [and so forth]. They are not fixated on the notions of '[the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience'; 'this all-aspect omniscience' [and so forth]; or 'their all-aspect omniscience' [and so forth].

53.45 "They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are permanent, or that they are impermanent. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are permanent or impermanent. [F.106.a] They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are permanent or impermanent. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are permanent or impermanent.

53.46 "They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are imbued with happiness or suffering. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are imbued with happiness or suffering. They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are imbued with happiness or suffering. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are imbued with happiness or suffering.

53.47 "They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are with self or without self. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are with self or without self. They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are with self or without self. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are with self or without self.

53.48 "They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are at peace or not at peace. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are at peace or not at peace. They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are at peace or not at peace. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are at peace or not at peace.

53.49 "They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are empty or not empty. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty or not empty. They

- are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and [F.106.b] links of dependent origination are empty or not empty. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty or not empty.
- 53.50 “They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are with signs or without signs. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are with signs or without signs. They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are with signs or without signs. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are with signs or without signs.
- 53.51 “They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms have aspirations or lack aspirations. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness have aspirations or lack aspirations. They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination have aspirations or lack aspirations. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, have aspirations or lack aspirations.
- 53.52 “They are not fixated on the notions that physical forms are void or not void. They are not fixated on the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are void or not void. {Ki.V: 61} They are not fixated on the notions that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are void or not void. They are not fixated on the notions that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are void or not void.⁴⁹⁰
- 53.53 “If you ask why, one cannot attain consummate buddhahood with respect to phenomena without inherent existence, which are said to be permanent or impermanent, which are said to be imbued with happiness or imbued with suffering, [F.107.a] which are said to be with self or without self, which are said to be at peace or not at peace, which are said to be empty or not empty, which are said to be with signs or without signs, which are said to have aspirations or lack aspirations, and which are said to be void or not void. The essential nature cannot be brought into being by means of the essential nature.⁴⁹¹
- 53.54 “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity will dwell in all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, just as the army of an imperial monarch with its four corps goes wherever that imperial monarch goes, in the same way, Subhūti, those other five perfections indeed follow the perfection of wisdom, and they come to a halt wherever all-aspect omniscience is. Subhūti, just as an imperial monarch traverses a straight path, riding a chariot drawn by four pairs of horses, in the same way the perfection of wisdom, driving the other five perfections, indeed traverses the smooth path that leads to all-aspect omniscience.”

53.55 “Blessed Lord, what is the path of bodhisattva great beings? What is not their path?”

The Blessed One replied, “For those who would attain all-aspect omniscience, the path of the śrāvakas is not the path of bodhisattva great beings, [F.107.b] and the path of the pratyekabuddhas is not the path of bodhisattva great beings. For those who would attain all-aspect omniscience, the six perfections with the perfection of wisdom in front are the path of bodhisattva great beings. These respectively are not and are the paths of bodhisattva great beings.”

53.56 “Blessed Lord, so it is that this perfection of wisdom, disclosing what is and is not the path, is established for the great advantage of bodhisattva great beings.”

53.57 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “By disclosing what is and is not the path, the perfection of wisdom is established for the great advantage of bodhisattva great beings. [Ki.V: 62] The perfection of wisdom is established for the immeasurable advantages of bodhisattva great beings. The perfection of wisdom is established for the countless advantages of bodhisattva great beings. Yet despite expressing these advantages, the perfection of wisdom does not appropriate physical forms. It does not appropriate feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. It is not established in order to appropriate [the goals], up to and including those on the levels of the śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas. This perfection of wisdom does not bring bodhisattva great beings to acquire unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. It does not reject the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. It does not confer all-aspect omniscience. Taking the abiding nature of reality as the standard, [F.108.a] this perfection of wisdom does not produce or stop anything at all.”

53.58 “Blessed Lord, if this perfection of wisdom does not produce or stop anything at all, in that case, Blessed Lord, how should bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom dispense gifts, how should they maintain ethical discipline, how should they cultivate tolerance, how should they undertake perseverance, how should they be absorbed in meditative concentration, and how should they cultivate wisdom?”

53.59 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “they should dispense gifts while referring to all-aspect omniscience. They should maintain ethical discipline while referring to all-aspect omniscience. They should cultivate tolerance while referring to all-aspect omniscience. They should undertake perseverance while referring to all-aspect omniscience. They should be absorbed in meditative concentration while referring to all-aspect omniscience. They should cultivate wisdom while referring to all-aspect omniscience. Making common cause with all beings, they should dedicate those roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If bodhisattva great beings dedicate their roots of virtuous action to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they will complete the cultivation of the six perfections. Bodhisattva great beings who cultivate loving kindness [will complete the cultivation of]⁴⁹² all-aspect omniscience. Bodhisattva great beings who are not without the six perfections [F.108.b] are not without all-aspect omniscience. Therefore, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should practice the six perfections. Bodhisattva great beings who practice the six perfections will complete all the roots of virtuous action and then attain all-aspect omniscience. So it is, Subhūti, {Ki.V: 63} that bodhisattva great beings should persevere in the six perfections.”

53.60 “Blessed Lord, how should bodhisattva great beings persevere in the six perfections?”

“In this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should reflect that physical forms are neither conjoined nor disjoined. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither conjoined nor disjoined. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are neither conjoined nor disjoined. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are neither conjoined nor disjoined. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are neither conjoined nor disjoined. [F.109.a] [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither conjoined nor disjoined. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should persevere accordingly in the six perfections.

53.61 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in physical forms.’ They should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness.’ They should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination.’ They should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment.’ They should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways.’ They should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.’ They should not persevere with the notion, ‘I will be established in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’

53.62 “If you ask why, physical forms are not established anywhere. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not established anywhere. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are not established anywhere. [F.109.b] All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are not established anywhere. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are not established anywhere. The ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are not established anywhere. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not established anywhere. It is in this nondwelling manner that bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.V:64}

53.63 “Subhūti, it is just as if a man wants to eat mangoes or breadfruit, he should plant mangoes or breadfruit. Having planted them, he should nurture them with water at the appropriate times, and care for them.⁴⁹³ Through these accumulated causes and conditions, the plants will increasingly develop, whereupon they will bear mangoes or breadfruit, and he can eat mangoes or breadfruit. In the same way, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should indeed train in the six perfections. They should favor beings with gifts, and they should favor them with ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom. They should liberate beings from cyclic existence. [F.110.a] So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who wish not to be dependent on others, who wish to refine the buddhafiels, who wish to be seated at the site of enlightenment, and who wish to turn the wheel of the Dharma should train in the six perfections.”

53.64 “Blessed Lord, do you say that they should train in the perfection of wisdom by means of the perfection of wisdom?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “I do say that they should train in the perfection of wisdom by means of the perfection of wisdom. I say that those who wish to attain sovereignty over all phenomena should train in the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, it is the perfection of wisdom through which the level of sovereignty over all phenomena will be attained. This perfection of wisdom is the gateway to all phenomena. Just as a great ocean is the gateway of all rivers, in the same way, the perfection of wisdom is indeed the gateway of all phenomena. Individuals who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas, who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, or who follow the vehicle of the bodhisattvas should train in this very perfection of wisdom. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should train in the perfection of generosity, and they should train in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They should train in the emptiness of internal phenomena, they should train in the emptiness of external phenomena, they should train in the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and they should train in [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They should train in the four applications of mindfulness, [F.110.b] and similarly they should train in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. {Ki.V: 65} They should train in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways. They should train in the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They should train in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

53.65 “Subhūti, just as it is hard for a master of archery holding a suitable bow to be overcome by enemies and assailants, in the same way, Subhūti, it is hard for bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom to be overcome by Māra or the gods in the realm of Māra. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should train in the perfection of wisdom. The lord buddhas of the past, future, and present turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner.”

53.66 “How do the lord buddhas turn their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of generosity? How do they turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom? [F.111.a] How do they turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the emptiness of internal phenomena, and how do they turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities? How do they turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? How do they turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways? How do they turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? How do they turn their enlightened intention toward [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?”

53.67 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the lord buddhas turn their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of generosity, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that gifts are not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that wisdom [and so forth] are not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the emptiness of internal phenomena, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that the emptiness of internal phenomena is not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth] are not apprehended. [F.111.b] They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the applications of mindfulness, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that the applications of mindfulness are not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that the noble eightfold path is not apprehended. {Ki.V: 66} They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that the dhāraṇī gateways are not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward those who practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, and by whatever means they turn their enlightened intention in such a way that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are not apprehended. They turn their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings who do not apprehend in that manner.

53.68 “Moreover, Subhūti, the lord buddhas do not turn their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings on the basis of physical forms. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the perfection of generosity. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. [F.112.a] They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not turn their enlightened intention toward them on the basis of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”⁴⁹⁴ {Ki.V: 104}

53.69 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings should indeed train in many matters, but they should not train in anything at all.”

“Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings should indeed train in many matters, but they should not train in anything at all. If you ask why, it is because those phenomena in which bodhisattva great beings should train are not apprehended.”

53.70 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who seek to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment should master in brief and in detail these six perfections, in the context of the teaching that the tathāgatas have given on those phenomena in brief and in detail. [F.112.b] Having mastered these, they should investigate them intensely through their words, and having investigated them through their words, realize them through their minds. By whatever means they should realize them in such a way that there is no movement of mind or mental states.”

53.71 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings who train in these six perfections that have been taught in brief and in detail will understand all phenomena in brief and in detail.”

53.72 “Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings understand all phenomena in brief and in detail?” {Ki.V: 105}

The Blessed One replied, “If they understand the real nature of physical forms, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail. If they understand the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail. If they understand the real nature of the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail. If they understand the real nature of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail. If they understand the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail. If they understand the real nature of the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail. If they understand the real nature of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, they will understand all phenomena, in brief and in detail.” [F.113.a]

53.73 “Blessed Lord, what is the real nature of physical forms?”

“This real nature in which arising is not apprehended, in which perishing is not apprehended, and in which change is not apprehended is the real nature of physical forms. Bodhisattva great beings should train in it,” replied the Blessed One.

53.74 “Blessed Lord, what is the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? What is the real nature of [all the causal and fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?”

“This real nature in which arising is not apprehended, in which perishing is not apprehended, and in which change is not apprehended is the real nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. Bodhisattva great beings should train in it. This real nature in which arising is not apprehended, in which perishing is not apprehended, and in which change is not apprehended is the real nature of [all causal and fruitional attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Bodhisattva great beings should train in it. When they understand the very limit of reality, they will understand all phenomena in brief and in detail,” replied the Blessed One.

53.75 “Blessed Lord, what is the very limit of reality?”

“Without finite limits is the very limit of reality. Bodhisattva great beings who train in this very limit will understand all phenomena in brief and in detail. When they understand the realm of phenomena, bodhisattva great beings will understand all phenomena in brief and in detail.” replied the Blessed One.

53.76 “Blessed Lord, what is the realm of phenomena?”

“Without expanse is the realm of phenomena. In that realm of phenomena no diminution or delimitation is apprehended. [F.113.b] Bodhisattva great beings who understand the realm of phenomena accordingly will understand all phenomena in brief and in detail,” replied the Blessed One.

53.77 “Blessed Lord, how should they understand all phenomena in brief and in detail?”

“By all means they should understand that all phenomena are neither conjoined nor disjoined,” replied the Blessed One.

53.78 “Blessed Lord, what are those phenomena that are not conjoined and that are not disjoined?”

The Blessed One replied, “Physical forms are neither conjoined nor disjoined. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither conjoined nor disjoined. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are neither conjoined nor disjoined. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are neither conjoined nor disjoined. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are neither conjoined nor disjoined. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are neither conjoined nor disjoined. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither conjoined nor disjoined. {Ki.V: 106}

53.79 “Conditioned elements are neither conjoined nor disjoined. Unconditioned elements are neither conjoined nor disjoined. If you ask why, they have no essential nature that could be conjoined or disjoined. Phenomena that are without essential nature are nonentities. [F.114.a] Nonentities are neither conjoined with nonentities nor disjoined from them. All phenomena should be understood accordingly.

53.80 “Subhūti, this is the brief summary for bodhisattva great beings. Bodhisattva great beings who are beginners should train in perfecting this brief summary. Bodhisattvas abiding on the tenth level should train in this brief summary. Bodhisattva great beings who train in this synopsis will understand all phenomena in brief and in detail.”

53.81 “Blessed Lord, this is realized by bodhisattva great beings of highest acumen!”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this will also be realized by bodhisattva great beings of feeble acumen. This will also be realized by bodhisattva great beings of average acumen. This will also be realized by bodhisattva great beings whose senses are absorbed. This will certainly be realized⁴⁹⁵ also by bodhisattva great beings who want to train in it, but it will not be realized by the indolent. It will not be realized by those who are feeble in perseverance. It will not be realized by those of diminished mindfulness. It will not be realized by those whose minds are agitated, but it will be realized by those who apply perseverance, are without indolence, and who maintain the applications of mindfulness. It will be realized by those who want to train in the level at which progress has become irreversible and who want to attain all-aspect omniscience.

53.82 “If they train in the perfection of wisdom as it has been revealed, and having trained in the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, [F.114.b] the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, they then attain all-aspect omniscience, during the time when those bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, they will discard any deeds of Māra that might arise, whenever they do arise. Therefore, bodhisattva great beings who wish to acquire skill in means should train in the perfection of wisdom.

53.83 “At the time when those bodhisattva great beings are practicing the perfection of wisdom, cultivating the perfection of wisdom, and persevering in the perfection of wisdom, all the lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in countless world systems, {Ki.V: 107} will turn their enlightened intention toward those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, it is because the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present have all emerged and will emerge from these six perfections. Therefore, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should reflect that they themselves will also attain those attributes that the lord buddhas of the past, future, and present have acquired, will acquire, and are acquiring. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should persevere in that manner. Bodhisattva great beings who persevere in that manner will swiftly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings [F.115.a] should never part from focusing their attention on all-aspect omniscience.

53.84 “If bodhisattva great beings practice in that manner for the sake of all-aspect omniscience, even though they may cultivate the perfection of wisdom for merely the duration of a finger snap, at the very least the merit of those bodhisattva great beings will increase manifold, more than it would by satisfying with gifts all beings situated in the world systems of the great trichilocosm, or by establishing them in ethical discipline, by establishing them in meditative stability, by establishing them in wisdom, by establishing them in liberation, by establishing them in seeing the wisdom of liberation, by establishing them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, by establishing them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship, or by establishing them in individual enlightenment. The merit of those who cultivate this profound perfection of wisdom, for the mere duration of a finger snap, will increase far more. If you ask why, generosity, ethical discipline, meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, seeing the wisdom of liberation, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, and the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment have all emerged from this [perfection of wisdom]. All the lord buddhas who are alive at present, teaching the Dharma in the world systems of the ten directions, have also emerged from this perfection of wisdom. All the lord buddhas who have appeared in the past, [F.115.b] will appear in the future, and appear in the present have also emerged and will emerge from this perfection of wisdom.

53.85 “Moreover, Subhūti, the merit of those who cultivate this perfection of wisdom with their attention focused on all-aspect omniscience for an instant, a day, a hundred days, a year, a hundred years, an eon, or any period from a hundred eons to a hundred countless eons, will increase manifold, more than it would by establishing in generosity all beings situated in world systems numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, or by establishing them in ethical discipline; by establishing them in meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation; {Ki.V: 108} or by establishing them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, by establishing them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, by establishing them in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, by establishing them in arhatship, or by establishing them in individual enlightenment.

53.86 “If you ask why, those lord buddhas who have revealed the foundation of meritorious deeds that originate from generosity, who have revealed the foundation of meritorious deeds that emerge from the cultivation of ethical discipline, and who have revealed the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment have indeed emerged from this [perfection of wisdom].

53.87 “One should know that bodhisattva great beings who are established in the perfection of wisdom, as revealed here, are irreversible. One should know that the tathāgatas turn their enlightened intention toward bodhisattva great beings who possess this skill in means. [F.116.a] One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have honored many hundred billion trillions of buddhas. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have developed the roots of virtuous action. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have been favored by spiritual mentors. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have practiced the six perfections. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have cultivated the fourteen aspects of emptiness. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have cultivated the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have cultivated the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have cultivated the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, and the four kinds of exact knowledge. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings possess the six extrasensory powers. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have been crown princes. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have fulfilled their aspirations. [F.116.b] One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are inseparable from the perception of the buddhas. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are inseparable from the roots of virtuous action. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are inseparable from the buddhafi elds. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings possess unbroken inspired speech. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have acquired the dhāraṇīs. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have perfected their physical form.⁴⁹⁶ One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have been excellently endowed with prophetic declarations. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings have voluntarily sought rebirth. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in matters to be realized. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in prophetic declaration. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in unwritten matters to be realized. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the conduct of a bodhisattva. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in verbal expression. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the inexpressible. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in singular designations. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in dual designations. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in plural designations. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in feminine designations, expert in masculine designations, and expert in neuter designations. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in past, future, and present events. [F.117.a] [B60]

53.88 “One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in physical forms. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. {Ki.V: 109} One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in [the goals], up to and including nirvāṇa. One should know that they are expert in conditioned defining characteristics, unconditioned defining characteristics, entities, nonentities, intrinsic entities, extraneous entities, and in that which is conjoined, that which is disjoined, that which is both conjoined and disjoined, and that which is neither conjoined nor disjoined. [F.117.b]

53.89 “One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the real nature. One should know that they are expert in the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, reality, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, the maturity of all phenomena, the very limit of reality, and the inconceivable realm. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in causes, conditions, and the absence of conditions. One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in conditioned elements, unconditioned elements, the presence of elements, and the absence of elements.

53.90 “One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in not focusing attention on physical forms. One should know that they are expert in not focusing attention on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. One should know that they are expert in not focusing attention on the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. One should know that they are expert in not focusing attention on all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. One should know that they are expert in not focusing attention on the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. One should know that they are expert in not focusing attention on the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. One should know that they are expert in not focusing attention on [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

- 53.91 “One should know that they are expert in the notion that physical forms are empty of physical forms. One should know that they are expert in the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty of consciousness [and so forth]. [F.118.a] One should know that they are expert in the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. One should know that they are expert in the notion that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. One should know that they are expert in the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. One should know that they are expert in the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. One should know that they are expert in the notion that [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are empty of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment [and so forth]. {Ki.V: 110} One should know that these bodhisattva great beings are expert in the path of refinement, in the path of nonrefinement, and in arising, ceasing, changing, desire, hatred, and delusion. One should know that they are expert in nondesire, nonhatred, and nondelusion. One should know that they are expert in views, the absence of views, wrong views, the absence of wrong views, [and so forth], up to and including all views. One should know that they are expert in [the aggregates of] name and form, in objects of reference, in predominant [conditions], in aspects, and in defining characteristics.

53.92 “One should know that they are expert in [the truths of the noble ones of] suffering, the cause [of suffering], the cessation [of suffering] and the path [that leads to the cessation of suffering]. One should know that they are expert in the hells and the path [that leads] to the hells. [F.118.b] One should know that they are expert in the animal realm and the path [that leads] to the animal realm. One should know that they are expert in the world of Yama and the path [that leads] to the world of Yama. One should know that they are expert in the human realm and the path [that leads] to the human realm. One should know that they are expert in the nonhuman realm and the path [that leads] to the nonhuman realm. One should know that they are expert in the god realms and the path [that leads] to the god realms. One should know that they are expert in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa and the path [that leads] to the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. One should know that they are expert in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth and the path [that leads] to the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth. One should know that they are expert in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth and the path [that leads] to the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth. One should know that they are expert in arhatship and the path [that leads] to arhatship. One should know that they are expert in individual enlightenment and the path [that leads] to individual enlightenment. One should know that they are expert in knowledge of the path and the path [that leads] to knowledge of the path. One should know that they are expert in all-aspect omniscience and the path [that leads] to all-aspect omniscience.

53.93 “One should know that they are expert in the sense faculties and in the perfection of the sense faculties. One should know that they are expert in swift wisdom, sharp wisdom, fast wisdom, definitive wisdom, vast wisdom, and wisdom that is equal to the unequaled. One should know that they are expert in past time, future time, and present time. One should know that they are expert in methods. One should know that they are expert in [understanding] the minds of beings, their resolve, and their aspirations. One should know that they are expert in establishing meaning, words, and the three vehicles.

53.94 “Subhūti, one should know that these bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, who actualize the perfection of wisdom, and who cultivate the perfection of wisdom possess these excellent advantages.” [F.119.a]

53.95 “Blessed Lord, how should they practice the perfection of wisdom? How should they actualize the perfection of wisdom? How should they cultivate the perfection of wisdom?”

The Blessed One replied, “They should practice the perfection of wisdom through the peace of physical forms, through the hollowness of physical forms, through the vacuity of physical forms, and through the essencelessness of physical forms. They should practice the perfection of wisdom through the peace of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; through the hollowness of consciousness [and so forth]; through the vacuity of consciousness [and so forth]; and through the essencelessness of consciousness [and so forth]. They should practice the perfection of wisdom through the peace of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; through the hollowness of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]; through the vacuity of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]; and through the essencelessness of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. {Ki.V: 111}

53.96 “You also asked how they should actualize the perfection of wisdom. In this regard, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom through the actualization of the emptiness of space. You also asked how they should cultivate the perfection of wisdom. In this regard, they should cultivate the perfection of wisdom through the breaking down of cultivation.”⁴⁹⁷

53.97 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, for how long will they practice it?”

“They should practice the perfection of wisdom commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment. They should actualize it in that manner. They should cultivate it in that manner,” replied the Blessed One.

53.98 “Blessed Lord, how should they practice without interruption and without separation from the mind set on enlightenment?”

“They should practice the perfection of wisdom by not allowing an opportunity for other considerations to intrude. [F.119.b] They should practice the perfection of wisdom, they should actualize the perfection of wisdom, and they should cultivate the perfection of wisdom by never giving up focusing their attention on all-aspect omniscience. By whatever means they should practice it in such a way that the phenomena constituting mind and mental states are unmoved. They should actualize it in that manner. They should cultivate it in that manner,” replied the Blessed One.

53.99 “Blessed Lord, will those who have practiced the perfection of wisdom, activated the perfection of wisdom, and cultivated the perfection of wisdom attain all-aspect omniscience?”

- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.100 “In that case, will those who have not cultivated it do so?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.101 “In that case, will those who have both cultivated and not cultivated it do so?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One. {Ki.V: 112}
- 53.102 “In that case, will those who have neither cultivated nor not cultivated it do so?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.103 “In that case, Blessed Lord, how will they attain all-aspect omniscience?”
- “In accordance with the real nature,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.104 “How is the real nature?”
- “It accords with the very limit of reality,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.105 “How is the very limit of reality?”
- “It accords with the realm of phenomena,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.106 “How is the realm of phenomena?”
- “It accords with the elements constituting the self, the elements constituting beings, the elements constituting life forms, and the elements constituting individual personalities,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.107 “Blessed Lord, how are the elements constituting the self, the elements constituting beings, the elements constituting life forms, [F.120.a] and the elements constituting individual personalities?”
- 53.108 “Subhūti, do you think that the self, sentient beings, life forms, and individual personalities are apprehensible?” asked the Blessed One in return.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 53.109 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “if the self, sentient beings, life forms, and individual personalities are not apprehended, how could one conceive of the elements constituting the self, the elements constituting beings, the elements constituting life forms, and the elements constituting individual personalities? Without conceiving of the perfection of wisdom and without conceiving of anything, they will attain all-aspect omniscience.”
- 53.110 “Blessed Lord, is the perfection of wisdom inconceivable? Are the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity inconceivable? Are [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, inconceivable?”
- 53.111 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perfection of wisdom is inconceivable. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity are inconceivable. The emptiness of internal phenomena is inconceivable. [All the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are inconceivable. The applications of mindfulness are inconceivable. The correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are inconceivable. [The fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are inconceivable. [The goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are inconceivable. [F.120.b]

53.112 “All phenomena, be they conditioned or unconditioned, be they attributes of the śrāvakas, attributes of the pratyekabuddhas, attributes of the bodhisattvas, or attributes of the buddhas, are inconceivable.”⁴⁹⁸

53.113 “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are inconceivable in this manner, {Ki.V: 113} in that case, Blessed Lord, why are the hells conceived? Why are the animal realm and the world of Yama conceived? Why are the god realms and the human realm conceived? Why are those entering the stream to nirvāṇa conceived? Why are those destined for only one more rebirth, those no longer subject to rebirth, and arhats conceived? Why are pratyekabuddhas conceived? Why are bodhisattvas conceived? Why are completely awakened buddhas conceived?”

53.114 “Subhūti, do you think that the concept of beings is apprehensible?” asked the Blessed One in return.

“No, Blessed Lord!”

53.115 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “if beings are not apprehensible, how could the denizens of the hells be conceived? How indeed could the animal realm, the world of Yama, the realms of gods or humans, those entering the stream to nirvāṇa, those destined for only one more rebirth, those no longer subject to rebirth, or pratyekabuddhas be conceived? How could bodhisattvas or completely awakened buddhas be conceived?”

53.116 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner should train in all phenomena that are inconceivable.”

53.117 “In that case, Blessed Lord, should bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom train in physical forms? Should they train in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? Should they train in the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination? Should they train in all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, [F.121.a] and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment? Should they train in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways? Should they train in the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas? Should they train in all-aspect omniscience?"

53.118 The Blessed One replied, "They should train in physical forms without subtraction or addition. They should train in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness without subtraction or addition. They should train in the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination without subtraction or addition. They should train in all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment without subtraction or addition. They should train in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways without subtraction or addition. They should train in the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas without subtraction or addition. {Ki.V:114} They should train in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, without subtraction or addition."

53.119 "Blessed Lord, how should they train in physical forms without subtraction or addition? How should they train in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness without subtraction or addition? [F.121.b] How should they train in [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, without subtraction or addition?"

"They should train in nonarising and nonceasing," replied the Blessed One.

53.120 "Blessed Lord, how should they train in nonarising and nonceasing?"

"They should train in the cultivation or breaking down of the nonconditioning of formative predispositions," replied the Blessed One.

53.121 "Blessed Lord, how should they train in nonconditioning?"

"They should train in nonconditioning by seeing that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics," replied the Blessed One.

53.122 "Blessed Lord, how should they see that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics?"

The Blessed One replied, "They should see that physical forms are empty of physical forms. They should see that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty of consciousness [and so forth]. They should see that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty of the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. They should see that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. {Ki.V: 115} They should see that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They should see that the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They should see that [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are empty of unsurpassed enlightenment [and so forth]. Subhūti, [F.122.a] it is in this way that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should train in all phenomena as being empty of their own defining characteristics.”

53.123 “Blessed Lord, if in this way physical forms are empty of physical forms; and feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty of consciousness [and so forth]; and [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty of unsurpassed enlightenment [and so forth], in that case, Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom?”

“Subhūti, the practice of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have is without practice,” replied the Blessed One.

53.124 “Blessed Lord, why is the practice of the perfection of wisdom without practice?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is because the perfection of wisdom is not even apprehended, nor are the bodhisattvas apprehended, nor indeed is practice apprehended. That is to say, there is no apprehending at all of any practice, of anyone who practices, or of anything that is practiced. Subhūti, the nonpracticing practice of the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have is that in which all those practices are not apprehended.”

53.125 “Blessed Lord, if they practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, without practicing, how should bodhisattva great beings who are beginners practice the perfection of wisdom?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who are beginners, commencing from their initial setting of the mind on enlightenment, should train in all phenomena as being nonapprehensible. When they dispense gifts, {Ki.V: 116} they should dispense gifts without apprehending anything. When they maintain ethical discipline, [F.122.b] they should maintain ethical discipline without apprehending anything. When they practice tolerance, they should practice tolerance without apprehending anything. When they undertake perseverance, they should undertake perseverance without apprehending anything. When they are absorbed in meditative stability, they should be absorbed in meditative stability without apprehending anything. When they cultivate wisdom, they should cultivate wisdom without apprehending anything. When they cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena, they should cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena without apprehending anything. When they cultivate [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, they should cultivate the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth] without apprehending anything. When they cultivate the applications of mindfulness, they should cultivate the applications of mindfulness without apprehending anything. When they cultivate the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, they should cultivate the noble eightfold path [and so forth] without apprehending anything. When they cultivate the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, they should cultivate the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] without apprehending anything. When they cultivate the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, they should cultivate the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] without apprehending anything. When they cultivate [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, they should cultivate all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] without apprehending anything.”

53.126 “Blessed Lord, to what extent is there apprehending? To what extent is there nonapprehension?” [F.123.a] “Simply to the extent that there is duality there is apprehending. Nonduality is without apprehending,” replied the Blessed One.

53.127 “Blessed Lord, what is duality?”

“To the extent that there is anything from eyes and sights to the mental faculty and mental phenomena, and to the extent that there are [the attributes and goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, all these, Subhūti, are duality,”⁴⁹⁹ replied the Blessed One.

53.128 “Blessed Lord, is it the apprehensible that is not apprehended, or else is it the nonapprehensible that is not apprehended?” {Ki.V: 117}

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is not the apprehensible that is not apprehended, nor is it the nonapprehensible that is not apprehended. Rather, Subhūti, it is the sameness of the apprehensible and the nonapprehensible that is not apprehended. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should train in the sameness of the apprehensible and the nonapprehensible. Bodhisattva great beings who train in the perfection of wisdom in that manner will become nonapprehenders.”

53.129 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, if they are not attached to apprehending and they are not attached to nonapprehension, how then will bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom perfect the levels, from one to the next, and, after perfecting the levels from one to the next, how will they attain all-aspect omniscience?”

53.130 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom while established in apprehending do not perfect the levels, from one to the next. When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, [F.123.b] they cannot perfect the levels from one to the next while they are established in apprehending. If you ask why, the perfection of wisdom is indeed nonapprehensible. Enlightenment, too, is nonapprehensible, and those who practice the perfection of wisdom, too, are nonapprehensible. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner.”

53.131 “Blessed Lord, if in that way the perfection of wisdom is nonapprehensible, and those who engage in enlightenment are also nonapprehensible, in that case, how do bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom understand all phenomena, including the notions that these are physical forms; that these are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; that these are the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; that these are the perfections; that these are the aspects of emptiness; that these are the factors conducive to enlightenment; that these are the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, or the formless absorptions; that these are the aspects of liberation or the serial steps of meditative absorption; that this is emptiness, signlessness, or wishlessness; that these are the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; that these are the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and that these are [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

53.132 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not understand anything in such a way that they would apprehend physical forms; that they would apprehend feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; that they would apprehend the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination; that they would apprehend all the perfections, [F.124.a] all the aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment; that they would apprehend the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; that they would apprehend the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; {Ki.V: 118} or that they would apprehend [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

53.133 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, if they do not apprehend even physical forms; if they do not apprehend even feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; and if they do not apprehend even [the attributes and goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, how then will they complete the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, and enter upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas? And, having entered upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas, how will they refine the buddhafi elds? And after refining the buddhafi elds, how will they bring beings to maturation? And having brought beings to maturation, how will they attain all-aspect omniscience? And having attained all-aspect omniscience, how will they turn the wheel of the Dharma? And having turned the wheel of the Dharma, how will they accomplish the enlightened activity of the buddhas? And having accomplished the enlightened activity of the buddhas, [F.124.b] how will they liberate beings from cyclic existence?”

53.134 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of physical forms. They do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. They do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment. They do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

53.135 “Blessed Lord, why then do bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom?”

“Bodhisattva great beings do not practice the perfection of wisdom for any reason at all,” replied the Blessed One. “If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are uncreated and unconditioned. The perfection of wisdom, too, is uncreated and unconditioned. Enlightenment, too, is uncreated and unconditioned. Bodhisattvas, too, are uncreated and unconditioned. [F.125.a] So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom without creating or conditioning anything.”

53.136 “Blessed Lord, if in that way all phenomena are uncreated and unconditioned, how then will these three vehicles—the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the Great Vehicle—be established?” {Ki.V:119}

53.137 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “no establishment of phenomena that are uncreated and unconditioned is at all apprehensible. The establishment of phenomena that are uncreated and unconditioned cannot be apprehended. If you ask why, it is because simple folk have not studied, and ordinary people are fixated on the five aggregates. Fixated on physical forms; fixated on feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; fixated on the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; fixated on all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment; fixated on the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; fixated on the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and fixated on [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, they give rise to conceits about physical forms and then apprehend physical forms. They give rise to conceits about feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness [F.125.b] and then apprehend consciousness [and so forth]. They give rise to conceits about the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination and then apprehend the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. They give rise to conceits about all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment and then apprehend the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. They give rise to conceits about the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways and then apprehend the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They give rise to conceits about the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas and then apprehend the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They give rise to conceits about [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and then apprehend [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

53.138 “Then they think, ‘I shall attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! I shall liberate beings from cyclic existence!’ And so they imagine that which is incorrect. If you ask why, Subhūti, although physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, the perfections, the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, {Ki.V: 120} signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, [F.126.a] the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers [of the tathāgatas], the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment are not apprehended even by the five eyes of the buddhas, those dim-witted persons who are blind and without eyes wish to liberate beings from cyclic existence.”

53.139 “Blessed Lord, if even with their five kinds of eye the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do not see those beings whom they would liberate from cyclic existence, how then, Blessed Lord, does the Blessed One, having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, then prophesy which beings belong to the three categories of certain, uncertain, or contrary destiny?”

- 53.140 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I do not apprehend any beings at all who belong to the three categories of those whose receptivity is certain, those whose receptivity is unpredictable, or those whose nonreceptivity is certain. On the other hand, Subhūti, in mundane, conventional terms, though not ultimately, I do indeed extricate those beings who perceive nonentities as entities from grasping inauthentic states.”
- 53.141 “Did the Blessed One then attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment after entering into ultimate reality?”
 “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.142 “In that case, did the Blessed One attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment after entering into mistaken [ways]?”⁵⁰⁰
 “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.143 “Blessed Lord, if they do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment after entering into ultimate reality, [F.126.b] and they do not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment after entering into mistaken [ways], in that case, Blessed Lord, do the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Are these not identical?”
- 53.144 The Blessed One replied, “The tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas do attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but they do not attain consummate buddhahood while established in any conditioned elements or unconditioned elements. Subhūti, just as an emanation of the tathāgatas is not established in any conditioned elements or unconditioned elements, but that emanation of the tathāgatas indeed goes and comes, stands and sits, and if it were to practice the perfection of generosity; practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; practice the emptiness of internal phenomena; practice [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; cultivate the four applications of mindfulness; cultivate the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; cultivate the four truths of the noble ones; attain and maintain the four meditative concentrations; attain and maintain the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the meditative stability of emptiness, [F.127.a] the meditative stability of signlessness, {Ki.V: 121} and the meditative stability of wishlessness; actualize the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and cultivate the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and if it were then to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, turn the wheel of the Dharma, and after turning the wheel of the Dharma, emanate an inestimable number of beings and prophesy which will belong to the three categories, do you think, Subhūti, that that emanation would have prophesied any beings at all to belong to these categories?"

"No, Blessed Lord!"

53.145 "In the same way, Subhūti," continued the Blessed One, "the tathāgatas know and understand all phenomena to be like an emanation. Knowing them to resemble an emanation, they do not apprehend and have not disciplined any beings at all. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom, in the manner of an emanation of the tathāgatas."

53.146 "Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are like an emanation, what is the distinction and the difference between the tathāgatas and their emanations? What is the source of the enlightened intention?"

53.147 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "no distinction or difference at all is apprehended between the tathāgatas and their emanations. Subhūti, the tathāgatas and their emanations are without distinction. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because emanations also perform those activities that the tathāgatas perform." [F.127.b]

53.148 "Blessed Lord, is it when the tathāgatas are not present that their emanations perform those activities?"

"It is, Subhūti!" replied the Blessed One.

53.149 "Blessed Lord, how will their emanations perform those activities when the tathāgatas are not present?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "this is just as a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha might, with peaceful intelligence, have emanated a tathāgata's body after observing no bodhisattva present, and then passed into final nirvāṇa, so that the emanation would subsequently perform the deeds of a buddha for an eon, and then, prophesied as a bodhisattva great being, become renowned for attaining final nirvāṇa, and yet in that emanation nothing at all would arise or attain final nirvāṇa! It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom, {Ki.V: 122} confident that all phenomena resemble an emanation."

53.150 “Blessed Lord, if there is no distinction between such an emanation and the tathāgatas, how will donations be purified when they are offered? Blessed Lord, when beings who are in search of merit, striving for the sake of nirvāṇa, offer donations to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, that [merit] never becomes extinct until those beings have attained final nirvana, in the expanse of nirvāṇa where the aggregates are not left behind. That being the case, Blessed Lord, when they offer donations to an emanation of the tathāgatas, will that [merit] similarly never become extinct until those beings have attained final nirvāṇa, in the expanse of nirvāṇa where the aggregates are not left behind?” [F.128.a]

53.151 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “on the basis of the reality by which the tathāgatas become worthy recipients of the offerings of the world, including the god realms, that emanation also would be a worthy recipient of the offerings of the world, including the god realms. Subhūti, leaving aside the offering of donations to the tathāgatas, and leaving aside the offering of donations to that emanation of the tathāgatas, Subhūti, if any noble sons or noble daughters are lovingly focus their attention on the tathāgatas, they will all reach the end of suffering before they reach the end of their roots of virtuous action. Subhūti, leaving aside those who lovingly focus their attention on them, if, Subhūti, there are any noble sons or noble daughters who scatter flowers in the air while focusing their attention on the tathāgatas, all of these, too, will reach the end of suffering before they reach the end of their roots of virtuous action. Subhūti, leaving aside those who who scatter flowers in the air while focusing their attention on the tathāgatas, if, Subhūti, there are any noble sons or noble daughters who say, ‘Homage to the buddhas!’ all of these, too, will gradually arrive at the end of suffering. In this way, Subhūti, donations offered to the tathāgatas are most advantageous! They have such excellence, such supreme attributes! For such reasons, Subhūti, if one resorts to the reality of all phenomena, one should know that there is no difference at all between the tathāgatas and an emanation of the tathāgatas. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should comprehend the reality of all phenomena and practice the perfection of wisdom.

53.152 “This reality of all phenomena will not at all be disturbed. [F.128.b] That is to say, it will not be disturbed by the notion that this is the perfection of wisdom, this is the reality of the perfection of wisdom. It will not be disturbed by the notions that this is the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity, this is the reality of the perfection of generosity [and so forth]. It will not be disturbed by the notions that this is the emptiness of internal phenomena, this is the reality of the emptiness of internal phenomena. It will not be disturbed by the notions that these are [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, this is the reality of the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities [and so forth]. It will not be disturbed by the notions that this is the applications of mindfulness, this is the reality of the applications of mindfulness. It will not be disturbed by the notions that these are the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, this is the reality of the noble eightfold path [and so forth]. It will not be disturbed by the notions that these are [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, this is the reality of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. It will not be disturbed by the notions that this is all-aspect omniscience, this is the reality of all-aspect omniscience.”

53.153 “Blessed Lord, if the reality of all phenomena should not become disturbed, has the reality of all phenomena not been purposefully disturbed by the Blessed One when he disturbed it with the notions that these are physical forms; these are feelings, {Ki.V: 123} perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; these are the sense fields; these are the sensory elements; these are the links of dependent origination; these are the perfections; these are the aspects of emptiness; these are the factors conducive to enlightenment; these are [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; [F.129.a] and these are [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?”

53.154 “Subhūti, that is not the case!” replied the Blessed One. “I have revealed the reality of all phenomena and proclaimed [the nature of] all phenomena through names and signs, in such a way that others might comprehend it, but the reality of all phenomena is undisturbed.”

53.155 “Blessed Lord, if the Blessed One has revealed the reality of all phenomena and expressed [the nature of] all phenomena through names and signs so that others might comprehend it, how then, Blessed Lord, are all phenomena without names and without signs expressed through names and signs?”

53.156 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this verbal expression is neither name nor sign, and it is indeed without fixation. Subhūti, I merely expressed the nature of suffering to others, but am without fixation on names and signs. Subhūti, the tathāgatas or the śrāvakas of the tathāgatas are not fixated on names or signs. Subhūti, if they were fixated on names or fixated on signs, emptiness would also be fixated on emptiness, signlessness would also be fixated on signlessness, wishlessness would also be fixated on wishlessness, the real nature would also be fixated on the real nature, the very limit of reality would also be fixated on the very limit of reality, the realm of phenomena would also be fixated on the realm of phenomena, and the unconditioned would also be fixated on the unconditioned. But since all these phenomena [F.129.b] are merely words, they do not dwell upon mere words. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom, continuing [to use] names and signs, but they should not be fixated on them.”

53.157 “Blessed Lord, if all these conditioned phenomena are merely names and signs, for what purpose do bodhisattva great beings set their minds on enlightenment, and, after setting their minds on enlightenment, experience many formative predispositions; engage in the conduct of a bodhisattva; dispense various gifts while engaging in the conduct of a bodhisattva; maintain ethical discipline; acquire tolerance; undertake perseverance; become absorbed in meditative stability; cultivate wisdom; practice all the aspects of emptiness; practice the applications of mindfulness; practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; and practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, {Ki.V: 124} signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas?” [B61]

53.158 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “you have asked that if all conditioned [F.130.a] phenomena are merely names and signs, in that case for what purpose do bodhisattva great beings engage in the conduct of a bodhisattva. In this regard, Subhūti, it is because all conditioned phenomena are merely names and signs that names are indeed empty of names, and signs are indeed empty of signs. It is for this reason that bodhisattva great beings engage in the conduct of a bodhisattva and attain all-aspect omniscience; that, having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma; and that, after turning the wheel of the Dharma, they bring beings to final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles. But in terms of these names and signs, no arising, no perishing, no abiding, and no transition can be apprehended.”

53.159 “Blessed Lord, you speak of ‘all-aspect omniscience, all-aspect omniscience’!”

“Subhūti, I do speak of ‘all-aspect omniscience, all-aspect omniscience’!” replied the Blessed One.

- 53.160 “Blessed Lord, since the tathāgatas have spoken of knowledge of all the dharmas, spoken briefly of knowledge of the path, and also spoken of all-aspect omniscience, what, Blessed Lord, is the distinction among these three sorts of all-knowing? What is the difference? What are their aspects?”
- 53.161 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “that which is called the knowledge of all the dharmas pertains to śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Knowledge of the path pertains to bodhisattva great beings. All-aspect omniscience pertains to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas.”
- 53.162 “Blessed Lord, why does knowledge of all the dharmas pertain to śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas? [F.130.b] Why does knowledge of the path pertain to bodhisattva great beings?” {Ki.V: 125}
- 53.163 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the extent of all outer and inner phenomena that there are is understood by śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, but this does not include all the paths. Subhūti, you also asked why knowledge of the path pertains to bodhisattva great beings. In this regard, Subhūti, all paths should be attained by bodhisattva great beings. All paths should be known by bodhisattva great beings. This is because all the paths of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas that there are, and all the paths of bodhisattva great beings that there are, should be completed. The activities associated with the path should be carried out through those paths, but the very limit of reality is not something brought into being.”
- 53.164 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings seek to complete the path of the buddhas in that manner, in that case, they would also actualize the very limit of reality!”
- “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should not actualize the very limit of reality without having refined the buddhafi elds and without having brought beings to maturity.”
- 53.165 “Blessed Lord, should bodhisattva great beings, having been established on the path, then actualize the very limit of reality?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.166 “In that case, Blessed Lord, should they do so, having been established in that which is not the path?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.167 “In that case, should they do so, having been established in both that which is the path and that which is not the path?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One. [F.131.a]
- 53.168 “In that case, should they do so, having been established in that which is neither the path nor not the path?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.169 “In that case, Blessed Lord, how will bodhisattva great beings actualize the very limit of reality?”

- “Subhūti, do you think that by being established on the path you have liberated your mind from contamination, without further grasping?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 53.170 “In that case, have you done so by being established on that which is not the path?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 53.171 “In that case, have you done so by being established on both that which is the path and that which is not the path?” asked the Blessed One. {Ki.V: 126}
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 53.172 “In that case, have you liberated your mind from contamination, without further grasping, by being established in that which is neither the path nor not the path?” asked the Blessed One.
- “No, Blessed Lord! Blessed Lord, my mind has not been liberated from contamination, without further grasping, by being established in anything at all. Blessed Lord, my mind has been liberated by not being established in anything at all.”
- 53.173 “In the same way, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings should actualize the very limit of reality without being established in anything at all.”
- 53.174 “As far as the expression ‘all-aspect omniscience, all-aspect omniscience’ is concerned, it is because of one single aspect that is termed all-aspect omniscience. That is to say, it is termed all-aspect omniscience because of the aspect of peace. Subhūti, it is also because the tathāgatas understand those aspects, principles, and signs that are the aspects, principles, and signs by which all phenomena are expressed that it is termed all-aspect omniscience. ” [F.131.b]
- 53.175 “Blessed Lord, among these three sorts of all-knowing—knowledge of all the dharmas, knowledge of the path, and all-aspect omniscience—is there a difference in the aspects of afflicted mental states that are abandoned, one through which they are abandoned without residue, and one through which they are not abandoned without residue?”
- 53.176 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “there is no difference in their abandoning of afflicted mental states. However, the tathāgatas have abandoned all reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, while the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have not abandoned all reincarnation through the continuity of propensities.”
- 53.177 “Blessed Lord, have all those śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas abandoned afflicted mental states without attaining the unconditioned state?”
- “No,” replied the Blessed One.
- 53.178 “Blessed Lord, are differences in the unconditioned state apprehensible?”

“No,” replied the Blessed One.

53.179 “Blessed Lord, if such [differences] are not apprehensible, why then did the Blessed One say that these have abandoned reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, but those have not abandoned reincarnation through the continuity of propensities?”

53.180 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “as far as reincarnation through the continuity of propensities is concerned, although there are indeed no afflicted mental states, the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas do have physical and verbal aspects of desire, hatred, and delusion. The reincarnation through the propensities of these [afflicted mental states] is harmful to all simple, ordinary persons in common, but not to them. On the other hand, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are entirely devoid of such [reincarnation through the continuity of propensities] in all respects. [F.132.a] It is not apprehended.”

53.181 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if the path is indeed nonexistent, and nirvāṇa is also nonexistent, in that case, why is it explained that this one is entering the stream to nirvāṇa, this one is destined for only one more rebirth, this one is no longer subject to rebirth, this one is an arhat, this one is a pratyekabuddha, this one is a bodhisattva great being, and this one is a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha?”

53.182 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “all these—who are said to enter the stream to nirvāṇa, to be destined for only one more rebirth, to be no longer subject to rebirth, and to be arhats, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattva great beings, or tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas—are indeed distinguished on the basis of the unconditioned [reality].”

53.183 “Blessed Lord, is it the unconditioned [reality] that makes distinctions to the effect that this one is entering the stream to nirvāṇa, this one is destined for only one more rebirth, this one is no longer subject to rebirth, this one is an arhat, this one is a pratyekabuddha, this one is a bodhisattva great being, and this one is a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha?”

53.184 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the unconditioned [reality] does not at all make these distinctions, although one may speak of them, taking words as one’s standard. Ultimately these distinctions cannot be made. If you ask why, in that [reality] there is no conception of verbal paths. Future limits are conceived with respect to those whose [past] limits have not been cut off. {Ki.V: 127} Subhūti, when all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, past limits are not apprehended, so how could future limits be apprehended? [F.132.b] That would be impossible! Subhūti, because those beings do not know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, I have explained to them that this is the limit of past time, this is the limit of future time. In all phenomena, which are empty of their own defining characteristics, the limit of past time or the limit of future time is nonapprehensible. So it is, Subhūti, that they should practice the perfection of wisdom because all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics. When they engage with all phenomena that are empty of their own defining characteristics, they are not fixated on anything at all, be they inner or outer phenomena, conditioned or unconditioned phenomena, the attributes of the śrāvakas, the attributes of the pratyekabuddhas, or the attributes of the buddhas.”

53.185 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, when you speak of ‘the perfection of wisdom, the perfection of wisdom,’ for what purpose do you speak of the perfection of wisdom?”

53.186 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “this perfection of wisdom (prajñā-pāramitā)⁵⁰¹ has reached the highest (parama) perfection of all phenomena, and that is why one speaks of the ‘perfection of wisdom.’ Moreover, Subhūti, it is through this perfection of wisdom that śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattva great beings, and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas all have arrived at the transcendence (pāram), and will arrive at the transcendence, of all phenomena—and that, too, is why one speaks of the ‘perfection of wisdom.’ Moreover, Subhūti, it is through this perfection of wisdom that the supreme principle (paramārtha) of all phenomena is distinguished, for in all phenomena no cyclic existence at all is apprehended; that, too, is why one speaks of the ‘perfection of wisdom.’ Moreover, Subhūti, in this perfection of wisdom the real nature is also included, the very limit of reality is also included, [F.133.a] and the realm of phenomena is also included, and so this, too, is why one speaks of the ‘perfection of wisdom.’

53.187 “Moreover, Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom is not conjoined with anything at all, nor is it disjoined. It is neither visible nor invisible, neither impeded nor unimpeded. If you ask why, it is because this perfection of wisdom is formless, invisible, and its sole defining characteristic is that it is without defining characteristics. Moreover, Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom gives rise to the entirety of inspired speech and the entirety of illumination with respect to all phenomena. Subhūti, this perfection of wisdom is unbroken and uncaptivated by Māra, by the gods of Māra’s realm, or by individual persons—from followers of the vehicles of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas {Ki.V: 128} to those who follow rival tīrthikas—or by evil associates. These cannot interrupt this perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have. If you ask why, it is because all these are not apprehensible in this perfection of wisdom, owing to the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should engage with the meaning of this perfection of wisdom in that manner.

53.188 “Moreover, Subhūti, by engaging with the meaning of this profound perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings should engage with the meaning of impermanence, they should engage with the meaning of suffering, they should engage with the meaning of nonself, and they should engage with the meaning of the knowledge of suffering. They should engage with the meaning of the knowledge of the origin [of suffering], the meaning of the knowledge of the cessation [of suffering], and the meaning of knowledge of the path. They should engage with the meaning of the knowledge that [contaminants] have ended,⁵⁰² the meaning of the knowledge that they will not recur, the meaning of the knowledge of phenomena, the meaning of subsequent knowledge,⁵⁰³ the meaning of the knowledge of the relative, the meaning of the knowledge that is masterful,⁵⁰⁴ and [F.133.b] the meaning of the knowledge that is semantic. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should engage with the meaning of the perfection of wisdom in that manner.”

53.189 “Blessed Lord, if meaning and nonmeaning are not apprehended in this profound perfection of wisdom, in that case how should bodhisattva great beings engage in the meaning of this profound perfection of wisdom?”

53.190 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom should engage in the following manner: They should not engage with the notion that desire is meaningful to them, or that it is meaningless. They should not engage with the notion that hatred is meaningful to them, or that it is meaningless. They should not engage with the notion that delusion is meaningful to them, or that it is meaningless. They should not engage with the notion that wrong view is meaningful to them, or that it is meaningless. They should not engage with the notion that all that is entailed in wrong views is meaningful to them, or that it is meaningless. If you ask why, the real nature of desire, hatred, and delusion does not render anything at all meaningful, and does not render anything at all meaningless.

53.191 “They should not engage with the notion that physical forms are meaningful to them. They should not engage with the notion that physical forms are meaningless to them. They should not engage with the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are meaningful to them. They should not engage with the notion that consciousness [and so forth] are meaningless to them. They should not engage with the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are meaningful to them. They should not engage with the notion that the links of dependent origination [and so forth] are meaningless to them. They should not engage with the notion that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are meaningful to them. They should not engage with the notion that the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] are meaningless to them. [F.134.a] They should not engage with the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are meaningful to them. {Ki.V: 129} They should not engage with the notion that the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] are meaningless to them. They should not engage with the notion that the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are meaningful to them. They should not engage with the notion that eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] are meaningless to them. They should not engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are meaningful to them. They should not engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are meaningless to them. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because after the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they do not apprehend anything at all that should be rendered meaningful or rendered meaningless.

53.192 “Moreover, Subhūti, whether the tathāgatas have been born or whether the tathāgatas have not been born, the real nature of phenomena and the abiding nature of phenomena are established. The realm of phenomena is established. These do not render anything at all meaningful, nor do they render anything at all meaningless. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, having relinquished the meaningful and the meaningless, should practice the perfection of wisdom.”

53.193 “Blessed Lord, why does the perfection of wisdom not render anything at all meaningful? Why does it not render anything at all meaningless?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, [F.134.b] “it is because the perfection of wisdom has no effect on conditioned phenomena or on unconditioned reality. Therefore, the perfection of wisdom does not render anything at all meaningful, and it does not render anything at all meaningless.”

53.194 “Blessed Lord, in that case is the unconditioned [reality] not meaningful for the buddhas and all noble śrāvakas of the buddhas?”

“The unconditioned [reality] is indeed meaningful for the buddhas and all noble śrāvakas of the buddhas, but it is not established for their benefit or harm,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, just as the real nature of space is not established for the benefit or harm of anything at all, in the same way, Subhūti, the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings possess is also not established for the benefit or harm of anything at all."

53.195 "Blessed Lord, do bodhisattva great beings, having trained in the unconditioned perfection of wisdom, not attain all-aspect omniscience?"

"Subhūti, it is so! It is so," replied the Blessed One. "Having trained in this profound perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings do attain all-aspect omniscience, but not in a dualizing manner."

53.196 "Blessed Lord, is it that something nondual attains something nondual?"

"No," replied the Blessed One.

53.197 "In that case, is it that something dualistic attains something dualistic?"

{Ki.V: 130}

"No," replied the Blessed One.

53.198 "In that case, how will it be attained?"

"It is attained when dualistic phenomena or nondual phenomena are indeed not apprehended," replied the Blessed One. "If you ask why, [F.135.a] it is because the nonapprehensible is attained. It will neither be attained through apprehending nor will it be attained through nonapprehension."

53.199 This completes the fifty-third chapter from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

CHAPTER 54

54.1 Then the venerable Subhūti said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, the perfection of wisdom is profound! Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment indeed achieve that which is difficult. That is to say, although no ‘being’ or concept of a being is at all apprehended, they have set out toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of beings. Blessed Lord, just like some person who seeks to grow a plant in groundless space, bodhisattva great beings indeed seek to attain all-aspect omniscience for the sake of beings.”

54.2 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings who set out toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of beings, and, having attained consummate buddhahood in all-aspect omniscience, liberate beings from clinging to sentient existence,⁵⁰⁵ achieve that which is difficult. Subhūti, it is just as when some persons want to grow a plant, and they would plant the stalk without having perceived the roots of that plant, and without having perceived its branches, trunk, leaves, flowers, or fruit. Nurtured with water at the appropriate times, gradually the trunk of that [plant] would become fully formed, its leaves would become fully formed, its flowers would become fully formed, and its fruit would become fully formed, and they would then enjoy the foliage of that plant, [F.135.b] they would enjoy its flowers, and they would enjoy its fruit. In the same way, bodhisattva great beings indeed set out toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, for the sake of beings. Gradually practicing the six perfections, they will attain all-aspect omniscience, and then they will sustain all beings in the manner of leaves, flowers, and fruit. Relying on bodhisattva great beings who are like leaves, beings will be liberated from the three lower realms. Relying on bodhisattva great beings who are like flowers, beings will be reborn in great and lofty royal families, in great and lofty priestly families, or in great and lofty householder families. {Ki.V: 131} They will be reborn among the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm, and they will be reborn among the gods of Trayastriṃśa, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Brahmakāyika, Brahmapariśadya, Brahmapurohita, Mahābrahmā Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parīttāśubha, Apramāṇāśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhat, Parīttabṛhat, Apramāṇabṛhat, Bṛhatphala, Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, Akaniṣṭha, the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Like fruit, bodhisattva great beings, having attained all-aspect omniscience, then establish those beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and establish them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, in arhatship, and in individual enlightenment. Relying on those same bodhisattva great beings, they will attain all-aspect omniscience, and having attained all-aspect omniscience, [F.136.a] they too will sustain all beings, just as fruit is sustaining. Those who offer them donations will also gradually attain final nirvāṇa through the three vehicles, namely, the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the Great Vehicle, and they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

54.3 “Although they do not conceive of a being and there is nothing even to conceive of as a being, they will nevertheless liberate beings from clinging to being. Subhūti, although bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, they do not apprehend any being at all, or any concept of a being, of whom they would think, ‘I should attain all-aspect omniscience for their sake!’ ”

54.4 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings should be known to resemble the Tathāgata himself. If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because in relying on bodhisattva great beings all the hells will be cut off. All the animal realms and all the worlds of Yama will be cut off. The [eight] unfavorable states with no opportunity [to practice the Dharma] and all lower realms will be cut off. All poverty will be cut off. All inferior destinies will be cut off. The entire realm of desire will be cut off. The entire realm of form will be cut off. The entire realm of formlessness will be cut off.”

54.5 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings should be known to resemble the Tathāgata himself. Subhūti, if there were no bodhisattva great beings, [F.136.b] there would then be no unsurpassed, complete enlightenment on the part of the lord buddhas of the past, future, or present. Nor would pratyekabuddhas appear in the world, nor indeed would arhats, those destined for only one more rebirth, those no longer subject to rebirth, or those entering the stream to nirvāṇa appear in the world. All the hells would not be cut off. The animal realms and all the worlds of Yama, too, would not be cut off. The entire realm of desire, too, would not be cut off. The entire realm of form and the entire realm of formlessness, too, would not be cut off.

54.6 “Subhūti, therefore when you said, ‘Bodhisattva great beings should be known to resemble the Tathāgata himself,’ {Ki.V: 132} it is so, Subhūti! It is so. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should be known to be resemble the Tathāgata himself. If you ask why, Subhūti, the real nature through which the tathāgatas are conceived; the real nature through which pratyekabuddhas are conceived; the real nature through which all the noble ones are conceived; the real nature through which physical forms are conceived; the real nature through which feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are conceived; the real nature through which the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are conceived; the real nature through which all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are conceived; the real nature through which the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are conceived, the real nature through which [F.137.a] the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are conceived; the real nature through which all-aspect omniscience is conceived; and the real nature through which conditioned elements, unconditioned elements, [and so forth] are conceived are all simply of that one nature. This is why it is called the real nature. It is because training in this real nature will bring those bodhisattva great beings to attain all-aspect omniscience that it is called tathāgata. For this reason, Subhūti, taking the real nature as their standard, bodhisattva great beings should be known to resemble the Tathāgata himself.

54.7 “So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should train in the perfection of wisdom that is the real nature. Subhūti, having trained in the perfection of wisdom that is the real nature, bodhisattva great beings train in the real nature of all phenomena. Having trained in the real nature of all phenomena, they perfect the real nature of all phenomena, and then they will attain mastery over the real nature of all phenomena. Having attained mastery over the real nature of all phenomena, they become skilled in [understanding] the capacities of all beings. Having become skilled in their capacities, they acquire skill in fulfilling those capacities. Having acquired skill in fulfilling those faculties, they will understand the deeds that beings have themselves undertaken. Having understood the deeds that beings have themselves undertaken, they will perfect their wisdom based on their aspirations. Having perfected their wisdom based on their aspirations, they will refine their wisdom with respect to the three times. [F.137.b] Having refined their wisdom with respect to the three times, they will act for the benefit of beings through the conduct of a bodhisattva. Having acted for the benefit of beings, they will refine the buddhafiels. Having refined the buddhafiels, they will attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they will turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they will establish beings in the three vehicles. Having established beings in the three vehicles, they will pass into final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where no aggregates are left behind. Subhūti, so it is that bodhisattva great beings should discern all these attributes and advantages, and then they themselves should set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they should also encourage others to set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

54.8 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, those bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom, as it has been revealed, are worthy of homage by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras.”

54.9 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Those bodhisattva great beings who practice this profound perfection of wisdom, just as it has been revealed, are worthy of homage by the world with its gods, humans, and asuras!”

54.10 “Blessed Lord, to what extent will the merit increase of those bodhisattva great beings who have initially set their minds on enlightenment and who seek to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of all beings?” {Ki.V: 133}

54.11 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm, [F.138.a] as many as there are, were to be established on the level of the śrāvakas and if they were to be established on the level of the pratyekabuddhas, would the merit of those beings greatly increase?”

54.12 “It would be great, Blessed Lord! It would be great, Sugata! It would be immeasurable, Blessed Lord! It would be immeasurable, Sugata!”

54.13 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “comparing the merit of all beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas or who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas with the merit of bodhisattva great beings who have initially set their minds on enlightenment, the merit of all beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas or who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the provision of merit acquired by bodhisattva great beings who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth,⁵⁰⁶ a ten millionth, a billionth, a ten billionth, a trillionth, or a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not match it in any number, fraction, categorization, comparison, or quality. If you ask why, the individuals who follow the vehicle of the śrāvakas and the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas.

54.14 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have become followers of the vehicle of the śrāvakas or who follow the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm had acquired the attributes of the śrāvakas, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, [F.138.b] a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, the attributes of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas.

54.15 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have acquired the attributes of the śrāvakas or who have acquired the attributes of the pratyekabuddhas! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of bright insight, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, those who are established on the level of bright insight have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the level of bright insight.

54.16 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of bright insight! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of the spiritual family, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, those who are established on the level of the spiritual family have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the level of the spiritual family. [F.139.a]

54.17 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of the spiritual family! {Ki.V: 134} Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the eighth-lowest level, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, those who are on the eighth-lowest level have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the eighth-lowest level.

54.18 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the eighth-lowest level! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of insight, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, those who are on the level of insight have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the level of insight.

54.19 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of insight! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of attenuated refinement, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. [F.139.b] If you ask why, those who are on the level of attenuated refinement have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the level of attenuated refinement.

54.20 “Leave aside all those beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of attenuated refinement! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of no attachment, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, those who are established on the level of no attachment have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the level of no attachment.

54.21 “Leave aside all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of no attachment! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of [an arhat’s] spiritual achievement, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, those who are established on the level of spiritual achievement have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the level of spiritual achievement.

54.22 “Leave aside all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of spiritual achievement! [F.140.a] Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm were established on the level of the pratyekabuddhas, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have initially set their minds on enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on. If you ask why, the pratyekabuddhas have originated from the bodhisattvas, but it is not the case that bodhisattva great beings have originated from the pratyekabuddhas.

54.23 “Leave aside all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have been established on the level of the pratyekabuddhas! Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm had entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of bodhisattvas who have themselves set out for enlightenment. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any comparison or quality, and so on.

- 54.24 “Leave aside all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm who have entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas! {Ki.V: 135} Even if all the beings of the world system of the great trichiliocosm had set out for enlightenment, their merit would come nowhere near even a hundredth part of the merit of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas. It would come nowhere near even a thousandth, a hundred thousandth, or anything up to a hundred billion trillionth part of it. It would not even match it in any number. It would not even match it in any fraction. It would not even match it in any categorization. It would not even match it in any comparison. It would not even match it in any quality.”
- 54.25 “Blessed Lord, on what should bodhisattva great beings who have initially set their minds on enlightenment focus their attention?” [F.140.b]
 “They should focus their attention on all-aspect omniscience,” replied the Blessed One.
- 54.26 “Blessed Lord, what is the entity of all-aspect omniscience? What is its reference? What is its predominant condition? What is its principle? What is its defining characteristic?”
 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “that which is called all-aspect omniscience is without entity; it is without defining characteristics. It is signless, effortless, nonarising, and unoriginated. Subhūti, you also asked, ‘What is the reference of all-aspect omniscience?’ Subhūti, all-aspect omniscience is without apprehending. Mindfulness is its predominant condition. Peace is its principle, and it is without defining characteristics. Subhūti, this is the reference of all-aspect omniscience. This is its predominant condition. This is its principle. This is its defining characteristic.”
- 54.27 “Blessed Lord, is all-aspect omniscience exclusively a nonentity or is it not? Are physical forms also nonentities? Are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness also nonentities? Are the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination also nonentities? Are all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment also nonentities? Are the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and [F.141.a] the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas also nonentities? Are great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, and great equanimity also nonentities? Are conditioned elements and unconditioned elements also nonentities?” {Ki.V: 136}

54.28 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “all-aspect omniscience is indeed a nonentity. Physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are also nonentities. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are also nonentities. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are also nonentities. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are also nonentities. Great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, and great equanimity are also nonentities. Conditioned elements and unconditioned elements are also nonentities. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in all-aspect omniscience there is no essential nature. Subhūti, that in which there is no essential nature is a nonentity.”

54.29 “Blessed Lord, why is all-aspect omniscience without essential nature?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “there is no conditioned essential nature. That in which there is no conditioned essential nature is a nonentity. For this reason, Subhūti, all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Similarly, Subhūti, [F.141.b] all phenomena also have the essential nature of emptiness. All phenomena have the essential nature of signlessness. All phenomena have the essential nature of wishlessness. Similarly, Subhūti, all phenomena also have the essential nature of the real nature. All phenomena have the essential nature of the very limit of reality. All phenomena have the essential nature of the realm of phenomena. For this reason, too, Subhūti, one should know that all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity.”

54.30 “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, in that case, with what skill in means do bodhisattva great beings who have initially set their minds on enlightenment refine the buddhafiels and bring beings to maturity while practicing the perfection of generosity? With what do they refine the buddhafiels and bring beings to maturity while practicing the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom? With what do they refine the buddhafiels and bring beings to maturity while practicing the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration? With what do they refine the buddhafiels and bring beings to maturity while practicing loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity? With what do they refine the buddhafi elds and bring beings to maturity while practicing the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception? With what do they refine the buddhafi elds and bring beings to maturity while practicing the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities? With what do they refine the buddhafi elds and bring beings to maturity [F.142.a] while practicing the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? With what do they refine the buddhafi elds and bring beings to maturity while practicing the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, {Ki.V: 137} the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, great compassion, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?”

54.31 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the skill in means of bodhisattva great beings is that they investigate all phenomena as having the essential nature of nonentity and that they refine the buddhafi elds and bring beings to maturity, while cognizing that those buddhafi elds and those beings also are of the essential nature of nonentity. They investigate the path of enlightenment while practicing the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They investigate the path of enlightenment while practicing the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. [F.142.b] They investigate the path of enlightenment while practicing the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They investigate the path of enlightenment while practicing the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They investigate the path of enlightenment while practicing [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

54.32 “They know that the path of enlightenment is also of the essential nature of nonentity. That is to say, those bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections and investigate that path of enlightenment until they acquire the ten powers of the tathāgatas, and until they acquire the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, great compassion, and all-aspect omniscience. That, Subhūti, is the path of the bodhisattvas. Abiding on that path, they investigate all the perfections. Having investigated all the perfections, they will, through the wisdom of a single instant, attain all-aspect omniscience. At that time, they will also cast off all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, abandoning them so that they will not recur. When they observe the world system of the great trichilocosm with the buddha eye, [F.143.a] since they do not even apprehend nonentities, what need one say about entities!

54.33 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dispense gifts, and although they do dispense gifts in that way, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. Also, as far as the giver is concerned, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. And as far as the recipient is concerned, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. They do not even apprehend the mind of enlightenment. They do not conceptualize it, they do not objectify it, and they do not observe it. {Ki.V:138}

54.34 “When they practice the perfection of wisdom, they maintain ethical discipline, they cultivate tolerance, they undertake perseverance, they experience meditative concentration, and they cultivate wisdom, and although they do cultivate wisdom [and so forth] in that way, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. Also, as far as the one who cultivates that wisdom is concerned, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. And as far as the beings for whom they cultivate wisdom are concerned, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities.

54.35 “When they practice the emptiness of internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, [F.143.b] the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, as far as all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are concerned, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. Also, as far as [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, are concerned, they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. As far as the act of attaining consummate buddhahood is concerned, along with its objective, consummate buddhahood, and the one who attains consummate buddhahood, here too they are without concepts—they do not conceptualize and they do not focus their attention either on entities or on nonentities. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. They have not been created by the buddhas, nor indeed have they been created by the pratyekabuddhas or the śrāvakas. All phenomena are without a creator; they are devoid of a creator.”

54.36 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, in that case are all phenomena themselves devoid of all phenomena?”

“Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, all phenomena themselves are devoid of all phenomena.”

54.37 “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are in that way themselves devoid of all phenomena, how do phenomena cognize that phenomena are entities or that they are nonentities? Blessed Lord, phenomena that are nonentities cannot cognize phenomena that are nonentities. Nor can phenomena that are entities cognize phenomena that are entities. Nor can phenomena that are nonentities cognize phenomena that are entities. Nor can phenomena that are entities cognize phenomena that are nonentities. Since in that way all phenomena are not cognizable, [F.144.a] how could bodhisattva great beings think that they are entities or that they are nonentities?”

54.38 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, on the basis of mundane relative [appearances] they do teach that phenomena are entities or that they are nonentities, but that is not the case in terms of ultimate [truth].”

54.39 “Blessed Lord, are mundane relative [appearances] one thing and ultimate [truth] another?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “mundane relative [appearances] are not one thing and ultimate [truth] another. The real nature of mundane relative [appearances] is the real nature of ultimate [truth], but since beings misconceive it, they do not know and do not perceive that real nature. For their sake bodhisattva great beings say on the basis of mundane relative [appearances] that phenomena are entities or that they are nonentities. Subhūti, since all beings perceive the five aggregates as entities and do not perceive them as nonentities, {Ki.V: 139} for their sake, [bodhisattva great beings], commencing with the excellent analysis of phenomena, speak in such a way that they will indeed understand them to be nonentities. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner.”

54.40 This completes the fifty-fourth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 55

- 55.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Venerable Lord, when one speaks of the conduct of a bodhisattva, of what is the expression bodhisattva conduct a designation?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, [F.144.b] “the expression *bodhisattva conduct*⁵⁰⁷ denotes conduct for the sake of enlightenment. That is why it is termed bodhisattva conduct.”

- 55.2 “Blessed Lord, in what conduct do bodhisattva great beings engage?”

The Blessed One replied, “They engage with the notion that physical forms are empty, yet they do so without any idea whatsoever of a duality. They engage with the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty, yet they do so without any idea whatsoever of a duality. They engage with the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty, yet they do so without any idea whatsoever of a duality. They engage with the notion that the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom are empty. They engage with the notion that the emptiness of internal phenomena and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are empty. They engage with the notion that the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, the fourth meditative concentration, loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, equanimity, the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception are empty. They engage with the notion that the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are empty. They engage with the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.145.a] the meditative stability of emptiness, the meditative stability of signlessness, the meditative stability of wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty. They engage with the notion that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty. They engage with the notion that the refinement of the buddhafi elds, the maturation of beings, inspired speech, and the actualization of letters are empty. They engage with the notion that the introduction to letters and the introduction to the absence of letters are empty. They engage with the notion that dhāraṇīs⁵⁰⁸ are empty, and they engage with the notion that conditioned elements and nonconditioned elements {Ki.V: 140} are empty, yet they do so without any idea whatsoever of a duality. [B62]

55.3 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner conduct themselves in enlightenment. Therefore one speaks of ‘the bodhisattva conduct.’ ”

55.4 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, when one speaks of a buddha,⁵⁰⁹ what does the term buddha designate?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is genuine reality that is called buddha. Moreover, Subhūti, it is because they have attained that genuine reality that is consummate buddhahood that buddhas are so called. Buddhas are so called because they have realized genuine reality. Moreover, Subhūti, buddhas are so called because they have definitively attained consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena.”

55.5 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, when one speaks of ‘enlightenment,’⁵¹⁰ what does the term enlightenment designate?” [F.145.b]

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “enlightenment designates emptiness. It designates the real nature. It designates the unmistaken real nature, the one and only real nature, reality, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of reality, maturity with respect to all phenomena, and the very limit of reality. Moreover, Subhūti, enlightenment is so called because this ‘enlightenment’ is the real nature, the unmistaken real nature, the one and only real nature, and it is unalterable. Moreover, Subhūti, enlightenment is so called because this ‘enlightenment’ is a mere name or sign. Moreover, Subhūti, genuine reality is the meaning of enlightenment. Moreover, Subhūti, enlightenment is so called because it is the realization that all phenomena are merely names or signs. Moreover, Subhūti, indivisible reality is the meaning of enlightenment. Moreover, Subhūti, enlightenment is so called because it is the enlightenment of the lord buddhas. Moreover, Subhūti, enlightenment is so called because it is the consummate buddhahood that the lord buddhas have attained.”

55.6 “Blessed Lord, with regard to the roots of virtuous action of those bodhisattva great beings who conduct themselves in this enlightenment, and who practice the six perfections; practice all the aspects of emptiness; practice the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, [F.146.a] the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and who engage in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do they accumulate or do they decline? Do they decrease or do they increase? Do they arise or do they cease? Are they afflicted or are they purified?”

55.7 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “with regard to those bodhisattva great beings who conduct themselves in this enlightenment, and who practice the six perfections; practice all the aspects of emptiness; practice the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; {Ki.V: 141} practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and who engage in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, nothing at all accumulates or declines, nothing decreases or increases, nothing arises or ceases, and nothing is defiled or purified. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because, with regard to the enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, nothing is established by way of apprehending, so that nothing at all will accumulate or decline, decrease or increase, arise or cease, or be defiled or purified.”

55.8 “Blessed Lord, if, with regard to the enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, [F.146.b] nothing is established by way of apprehending, so that nothing at all will accumulate or decline, decrease or increase, arise or cease, or be defiled or purified—in that case, Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how will they acquire the perfection of generosity? How will they acquire the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom? How will they practice the emptiness of internal phenomena? How will they practice [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities? How will they practice the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? How will they practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways? How will they practice the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas? How will they practice the ten levels of the bodhisattvas? How will they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas? How will they enter a bodhisattva's full maturity?"

55.9 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, [F.147.a] "bodhisattva great beings do not have any idea of a duality. Subhūti, it is not with duality that bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity. It is not with duality that they practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. It is not with duality that they practice the emptiness of internal phenomena. It is not with duality that they practice [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. It is not with duality that they practice the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path. It is not with duality that they practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. It is not with duality that they practice the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. It is not with duality that they practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience."

55.10 "Blessed Lord, if it is not with duality that they practice the perfection of generosity; practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom; not with duality that they practice any of the aspects of emptiness; not with duality that they practice the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; not with duality that they practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.147.b] the aspects of liberation, {Ki.V: 142} the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; not with duality that they practice the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas; and not with duality that they practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, in that case, how do the roots of virtuous action that those bodhisattva great beings possess increase manifold? Commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until their final setting of the mind on enlightenment, how do the roots of virtuous action increase manifold?"

55.11 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "those who practice in a dualistic manner do not grow the roots of virtuous action. If you ask why, Subhūti, all ordinary, simple persons depend on duality and they do not grow the roots of virtuous action. Bodhisattva great beings do not practice in a dualistic manner. Commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until their final setting of the mind on enlightenment, their roots of virtuous action do increase. They will not be debased by any roots of nonvirtuous action that the world with its gods, humans, and asuras may have. Consequently, they will not fall into the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas, and neither will they be captivated by other nonvirtuous attributes. If those who are captivated by such phenomena were to practice the perfection of generosity, their roots of virtuous action would not increase manifold. If they were to practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom, their roots of virtuous action would not increase manifold. If they were to practice the emptiness of internal phenomena and if they were to practice [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, their roots of virtuous action [F.148.a] would not increase manifold. If they were to practice the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path, their roots of virtuous action would not increase manifold. If they were to practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways, their roots of virtuous action would not increase manifold. If they were to practice the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas, their roots of virtuous action would not increase manifold. If they were to practice [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, their roots of virtuous action would not increase manifold. Bodhisattva great beings cannot be debased in that manner. Subhūti, so it is that they should practice the perfection of wisdom.”

55.12 “Blessed Lord, should bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of the roots of virtuous action?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings do not practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of the roots of virtuous action. Nor indeed do they practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of the roots of nonvirtuous action. Yet, bodhisattva great beings cannot attain all-aspect omniscience without having revered the lord buddhas, without having perfected the roots of virtuous action, or without having been accepted by spiritual mentors.” [F.148.b]

55.13 “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings who have revered the lord buddhas, who have been favored by the roots of virtuous action, and who have been accepted by spiritual mentors attain all-aspect omniscience?” {Ki.V:143}

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, bodhisattva great beings revere the lord buddhas and acquire all the teachings that they have imparted, including the discourses, the sayings in prose and verse, the prophetic declarations, the verses, the aphorisms, the contexts, the quotations, the tales of past lives, the most extensive teachings, the marvelous events, the narratives, and the established instructions. Having acquired these, they have also investigated them verbally, examined them intensively through their mental faculties, and comprehended them through their view. They have mastered the dhāraṇīs, and having mastered the dhāraṇīs, they have developed exact knowledge. Those who have developed exact knowledge, having passed away and transmigrated from this life, will never squander those attributes until they have attained all-aspect omniscience. If they develop the roots of virtuous action in the presence of those lord buddhas and they are favored with those roots of virtuous action, they will never be reborn in the lower realms or among beings who have no leisure [to practice the Dharma]. Through these roots of virtuous action, they will acquire a pure physical body, and through these physical bodies they will also refine the buddhafiels. They will bring beings to maturity. Even after being favored by those roots of virtuous action, they will never be without spiritual mentors, including the lord buddhas, bodhisattva great beings, and the excellent teachers of those who follow the vehicles of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas. [F.149.a] So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should revere the lord buddhas, they should develop the roots of virtuous action, and they should attend upon spiritual mentors.”

55.14 This completes the fifty-fifth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

56.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if there are bodhisattva great beings who have not revered the lord buddhas, have not even perfected the roots of virtuous action, and have not even been favored by spiritual mentors, would they not attain all-aspect omniscience?”

56.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings who have not revered the lord buddhas, have not even perfected the roots of virtuous action, and have not even been favored by spiritual mentors will not attain all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, when even those who have revered the lord buddhas, have perfected the roots of virtuous action, and have attended upon spiritual mentors cannot now attain all-aspect omniscience, how could those who have not revered the lord buddhas, have not perfected the roots of virtuous action, and have not been favored by spiritual mentors possibly attain all-aspect omniscience! That would be impossible. Therefore, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who wish to maintain authentically the name of a bodhisattva and [F.149.b] those who wish to swiftly attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment {Ki.V: 144} should revere the lord buddhas. They should develop manifold roots of virtuous action, and they should attend upon spiritual mentors.”

56.3 “Blessed Lord, why do bodhisattva great beings not attain all-aspect omniscience, even though they have revered the lord buddhas, have perfected the roots of virtuous action, and have attended upon spiritual mentors?”

“It is because they are without skill in means,” replied the Blessed One. “They have not acquired those means from the lord buddhas, nor have they developed such roots of virtuous action, and neither have they attended upon such spiritual mentors who would reveal those means to them. This is why they do not attain [all-aspect omniscience].”

56.4 “Blessed Lord, what is the skill in means that bodhisattva great beings have, through which they would attain all-aspect omniscience?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, practice the perfection of generosity, while focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind they dispense gifts to the lord buddhas, the pratyekabuddhas, the śrāvakas, and to humans and nonhumans. That is to say, through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind, as far as those gifts are concerned they do not even have the perception of a gift. They have no perception of a recipient, nor do they have any perception of a giver. In this way they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, and they see that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. [F.150.a] Although they penetrate the defining characteristics of all phenomena, they do so through defining characteristics that are unconditioned in that all phenomena are said to be utterly ineffectual. Since they are endowed with such skill in means, they practice the perfection of generosity while increasing their roots of virtuous action. Practicing the perfection of generosity, they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafi elds. But other than that, in practicing the perfection of generosity in order that they might protect all beings and bring beings to maturity, they do not aspire for other fruits of their gifts, such that they would enjoy in cyclic existence.”

56.5 This completes the fifty-sixth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

- 57.1 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of ethical discipline, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, they maintain ethical discipline through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind. Thoughts of desire do not obscure them. Hatred does not obscure them. Delusion does not obscure them. Latent impulses do not obscure them. Obsessions do not obscure them. Other nonvirtuous attributes that might impede enlightenment also do not obscure them. These include miserliness, degenerate morality, thoughts of anger, thoughts of indolence, thoughts of irresolution, thoughts of distraction, thoughts of stupidity, {Ki.V: 145} pride, contempt, exalted pride, egotistical pride, the mindset of the śrāvakas, and the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in this way they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, and they see that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. [F.150.b] Although they penetrate the defining characteristics of all phenomena, they do so through defining characteristics that are unconditioned, in that all phenomena are said to be utterly ineffectual. Since they are endowed with such skill in means, they practice the perfection of ethical discipline while increasing their roots of virtuous action. Practicing the perfection of ethical discipline, they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafi elds. But other than that, in practicing the perfection of ethical discipline in order that they might protect all beings and bring beings to maturity, they do not aspire for other fruits of their ethical discipline, such that they would enjoy in cyclic existence.
- 57.2 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of tolerance, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, they cultivate tolerance through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind. Thoughts of desire do not obscure them. Hatred does not obscure them. Delusion does not obscure them. Latent impulses do not obscure them. Obsessions do not obscure them. Other nonvirtuous attributes that might impede enlightenment also do not obscure them. These include miserliness, degenerate morality, thoughts of anger, thoughts of indolence, thoughts of irresolution, thoughts of distraction, thoughts of stupidity, pride, contempt, exalted pride, egotistical pride, the mindset of the śrāvakas, and the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in this way they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, and they see that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. Although they penetrate the defining characteristics of all phenomena, they do so through defining characteristics that are unconditioned, in that all phenomena are said to be utterly ineffectual. [F.151.a] Since they are endowed with such skill in means, they practice the perfection of tolerance while increasing their roots of virtuous action. Practicing the perfection of tolerance, they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafiels. But other than that, in practicing the perfection of tolerance in order that they might protect all beings and bring beings to maturity, they do not aspire for other fruits of their tolerance, such that they would enjoy in cyclic existence.

57.3 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of perseverance, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, they undertake perseverance through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind. Thoughts of desire do not obscure them. Hatred does not obscure them. Delusion does not obscure them. Latent impulses do not obscure them. Obsessions do not obscure them. Other nonvirtuous attributes that might impede enlightenment also do not obscure them. These include miserliness, degenerate morality, thoughts of anger, thoughts of indolence, thoughts of irresolution, thoughts of distraction, thoughts of stupidity, pride, contempt, exalted pride, egotistical pride, the mindset of the śrāvakas, and the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas. {Ki.V: 146} If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in this way they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, and they see that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. Although they penetrate the defining characteristics of all phenomena, they do so through defining characteristics that are unconditioned, in that all phenomena are said to be utterly ineffectual. Since they are endowed with such skill in means, they practice the perfection of perseverance while increasing their roots of virtuous action. Practicing the perfection of perseverance, [F.151.b] they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafiels. But other than that, in practicing the perfection of perseverance in order that they might protect all beings and bring beings to maturity, they do not aspire for other fruits of their perseverance, such that they would enjoy in cyclic existence.

57.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of meditative concentration, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, they are absorbed in meditative concentration through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind. Thoughts of desire do not obscure them. Hatred does not obscure them. Delusion does not obscure them. Latent impulses do not obscure them. Obsessions do not obscure them. Other nonvirtuous attributes that might impede enlightenment also do not obscure them. These include miserliness, degenerate morality, thoughts of anger, thoughts of indolence, thoughts of irresolution, thoughts of distraction, thoughts of stupidity, pride, contempt, exalted pride, egotistical pride, the mindset of the śrāvakas, and the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas. {Ki.V: 147} If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in this way they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, and they see that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. Although they penetrate the defining characteristics of all phenomena, they do so through defining characteristics that are unconditioned, in that all phenomena are said to be utterly ineffectual. Since they are endowed with such skill in means, they practice the perfection of meditative concentration while increasing their roots of virtuous action. Practicing the perfection of meditative concentration, they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafiels. [F.152.a] But other than that, in practicing the perfection of meditative concentration in order that they might protect all beings and bring beings to maturity, they do not aspire for other fruits of their meditative concentration, such that they would enjoy in cyclic existence.

57.5 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, they cultivate wisdom through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind. Thoughts of desire do not obscure them. Hatred does not obscure them. Delusion does not obscure them. Latent impulses do not obscure them. Obsessions do not obscure them. Other nonvirtuous attributes that might impede enlightenment also do not obscure them. These include miserliness, degenerate morality, thoughts of anger, thoughts of indolence, thoughts of irresolution, thoughts of distraction, thoughts of stupidity, pride, contempt, exalted pride, egotistical pride, the mindset of the śrāvakas, and the mindset of the pratyekabuddhas. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because in this way they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, and they see that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. Although they penetrate the defining characteristics of all phenomena, they do so through defining characteristics that are unconditioned, in that all phenomena are said to be utterly ineffectual. Since they are endowed with such skill in means, they practice the perfection of wisdom while increasing their roots of virtuous action. Practicing the perfection of wisdom, they bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafi elds. But other than that, [F.152.b] in practicing the perfection of wisdom in order that they might protect all beings and bring beings to maturity, they do not aspire for other fruits of their wisdom, such that they would enjoy in cyclic existence.”

57.6 This completes the fifty-seventh chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

- 58.1 Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings become absorbed in the first meditative concentration. They become absorbed in the second meditative concentration. They become absorbed in the third meditative concentration. They become absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration. They become absorbed in the immeasurable attitudes and the formless absorptions, but they do not hold on to the maturation of these [meditative concentrations and so forth]. If you ask why, it is because they possess skill in means. Through this skill in means, they know that those meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, and formless absorptions are empty of their own defining characteristics, {Ki.V: 148} and they know that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being.
- 58.2 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who possess skill in means, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, practice the path of renunciation through insight and cultivation, but they do not attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They do not attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship. They do not attain individual enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics and they know that all phenomena are nonexistent, unoriginated, unconsummated, and not brought into being. Practicing those factors conducive to enlightenment, they transcend the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. This, Subhūti, is the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising, which bodhisattva great beings have.
- 58.3 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they become absorbed in the eight aspects of liberation, [F.153.a] and they become absorbed in the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, but they do not attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They do not attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they know that all phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, they know that all phenomena are nonexistent and unoriginated, they know that all phenomena are unconsummated, and they know that all phenomena are not brought into being.

58.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings master the ten powers of the tathāgatas, they master the four fearlessnesses {Ki.V: 149} and the four kinds of exact knowledge, they master the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and they master great loving kindness and great compassion, but they never attain all-aspect omniscience until they have refined the buddhafi elds and brought beings to maturity. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom.”

58.5 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings who practice such profound attributes but do not hold on to their maturation are of supreme intelligence!”

58.6 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings who practice such profound attributes but do not hold on to their maturation are of supreme intelligence. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because bodhisattva great beings do not stir from the essential nature.”

58.7 “Blessed Lord, from what essential nature do they not stir?”

“They do not stir from nonentity,” replied the Blessed One. [F.153.b] “Subhūti, with regard to that which you asked, namely, ‘From what essential nature they do not stir?’ they do not stir from the essential nature of physical forms. They do not stir from the essential nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not stir from the essential nature of the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. They do not stir from the essential nature of the perfection of generosity. They do not stir from the essential nature of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They do not stir from the essential nature of the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, and the emptiness of external and internal phenomena. They do not stir from the essential nature of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They do not stir from the essential nature of the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They do not stir from the essential nature of the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They do not stir from the essential nature of the truths of the noble ones. They do not stir from the essential nature of the meditative stability of emptiness, the meditative stability of signlessness, and the meditative stability of wishlessness. {Ki.V: 150} They do not stir from the essential nature of the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They do not stir from the essential nature of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not stir from the essential nature of great loving kindness and great compassion. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the essential nature of these attributes is nonentity. Nonentities cannot attain consummate buddhahood through nonentities.”

58.8 “Blessed Lord, can nonentities attain consummate buddhahood through entities?”

“No, Subhūti!” [F.154.a] replied the Blessed One.

58.9 “In that case, can entities attain consummate buddhahood through nonentities?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

58.10 “In that case, can entities attain consummate buddhahood through entities?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

58.11 “In that case, can nonentities attain consummate buddhahood through nonentities?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One.

58.12 “In that case, Blessed Lord, if nonentities do not attain clear realization through entities, if entities do not attain clear realization through nonentities, if entities do not attain clear realization through entities, and if nonentities do not attain clear realization through nonentities, would that not mean, Blessed Lord, that there is no attainment, that there is no clear realization, that not one of these alternatives applies?”

“Clear realization is not such that it can be actualized through these four alternatives—existence, nonexistence, both, and neither,” replied the Blessed One.

58.13 “In that case, Blessed Lord, how is it actualized?”

“Clear realization is such that there are neither entities nor nonentities. In it there are no conceptual elaborations, so clear realization is without conceptual elaborations and free from conceptual elaborations,” replied the Blessed One.

58.14 “Blessed Lord, what are the conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have?”

The Blessed One replied, “The notions that physical forms are permanent or that they are impermanent are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness [F.154.b] are permanent or that they are impermanent are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that physical forms are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that physical forms are with self or that they are without self are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are with self or that they are without self are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that physical forms are at peace or that they are not at peace are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are at peace or that they are not at peace are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notions that physical forms are comprehensible or that they are not comprehensible are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. {Ki.V: 151} The notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are comprehensible or that they are not comprehensible are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have.

58.15 “The notions that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are permanent or that they are impermanent, that they imbued with happiness or that they are imbued with suffering, that they are with self or that they are without self, that they are at peace or that they are not at peace, and that they are comprehensible or that they are not comprehensible are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have.

58.16 “The notion that suffering is comprehensible is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the origin [of suffering] is to be renounced is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the cessation [of suffering] is to be actualized and the notion that the path is to be cultivated are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. [F.155.a]

58.17 “The notion that the six perfections are to be practiced is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the emptiness of internal phenomena is to be cultivated is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, are to be cultivated is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are to be cultivated is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are to be cultivated is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have.

58.18 “The notion that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is to be known, observed, and transcended is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment are to be known, observed, and transcended is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the ten bodhisattva levels are to be perfected is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that one enters into the maturity of the bodhisattvas is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that the buddhafi elds are to be refined and the notion that beings are to be brought to maturity are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have. [F.155.b] The notions that the ten powers of the tathāgatas are to be developed, that the four fearlessnesses are to be developed, that the four kinds of exact knowledge are to be developed, that great loving kindness and great compassion are to be developed, and that the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are to be developed are conceptual elaborations that bodhisattva great beings might have.

58.19 “The notion that all-aspect omniscience is to be attained is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have. The notion that all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities are to be abandoned is a conceptual elaboration that bodhisattva great beings might have.

58.20 “Therefore, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that physical forms are permanent or impermanent. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that [physical forms] are imbued with happiness or suffering, that they are with self or without self, that they are at peace or not at peace, or that they are comprehensible or not comprehensible. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are permanent or impermanent. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that these are imbued with happiness or suffering, that they are with self or without self, that they are at peace or not at peace, or that they are comprehensible or not comprehensible.

58.21 “They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are permanent or impermanent, that they are imbued with happiness or suffering, {Ki.V: 152} that they are with self or without self, that they are at peace or not at peace, or that they are comprehensible or not comprehensible. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are permanent or impermanent, that they are imbued with happiness or suffering, that they are with self or without self, that they are at peace or not at peace, or that they are comprehensible or not comprehensible. [F.156.a]

58.22 “They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are to be cultivated.

58.23 “They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment are to be known, observed, and transcended. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that the ten bodhisattva levels are to be perfected. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that the maturity of the bodhisattvas is to be entered. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notions that the buddhafiels are to be refined and that beings are to be brought to maturity. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, and the four kinds of exact knowledge are to be developed. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are to be developed. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that all-aspect omniscience is to be attained. They are without conceptual elaboration and do not conceptually elaborate the notion that all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities are to be abandoned.

58.24 “If you ask why, the essential nature does not conceptually elaborate the essential nature. Nor do nonentities conceptually elaborate nonentities, and apart from the essential nature and nonentities, there is nothing else at all that would give rise to conceptual elaboration or that would be conceptually elaborated. Therefore, Subhūti, physical forms are free from conceptual elaboration. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are free from conceptual elaboration. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination [F.156.b] are free from conceptual elaboration. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are free from conceptual elaboration. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are free from conceptual elaboration. The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is free from conceptual elaboration. The fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship are free from conceptual elaboration. Individual enlightenment is free from conceptual elaboration. The bodhisattva levels are free from conceptual elaboration. The maturity of the bodhisattvas is free from conceptual elaboration. The buddhafiels to be refined and the beings that are to be brought to maturity are free from conceptual elaboration. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct attributes of the buddhas are free from conceptual elaboration. All-aspect omniscience is free from conceptual elaboration. The abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities is free from conceptual elaboration. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom that is without conceptual elaboration.

58.25 “Subhūti, it is indeed the case that physical forms have no essential nature. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness have no essential nature. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination have no essential nature. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment have no essential nature. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways have no essential nature. [F.157.a] The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa has no essential nature. The fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship have no essential nature. Individual enlightenment has no essential nature. The bodhisattva levels have no essential nature. The maturity of the bodhisattvas has no essential nature. The buddhafiels to be refined and the beings that are to be brought to maturity have no essential nature. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas have no essential nature. All-aspect omniscience has no essential nature.

58.26 “That which has no essential nature is without conceptual elaboration. Therefore, Subhūti, physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are without conceptual elaboration. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are without conceptual elaboration. {Ki.V: 153} All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are without conceptual elaboration. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are without conceptual elaboration. The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is without conceptual elaboration. The fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship are without conceptual elaboration. Individual enlightenment is without conceptual elaboration. The bodhisattva levels are without conceptual elaboration. The maturity of the bodhisattvas is without conceptual elaboration. The buddhafiels to be refined and the beings that are to be brought to maturity are without conceptual elaboration. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are without conceptual elaboration. All-aspect omniscience is without conceptual elaboration. Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, they enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity.” [F.157.b]

58.27 “Blessed Lord, if the essential nature is not apprehended with respect to anything at all, by what do bodhisattva great beings enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity—the pathway of the śrāvakas or the pathway of the pratyekabuddhas?”

58.28 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings do not enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity through the path of the śrāvakas. They do not enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity through the path of the pratyekabuddhas. Bodhisattva great beings do not enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity through the path of the completely awakened buddhas. Rather, Subhūti, it is the case that bodhisattva great beings, having trained in all pathways, then enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. Just as an arhat of the eighth level, having trained in all attributes, enters into the authentic maturity appropriate for an arhat, and never attains the fruit of arhatship until the fruitional path has been accomplished, in the same way, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings also accomplish all paths and then enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. They will never attain all-aspect omniscience until they have attained the vajra-like meditative stability. Immediately after attaining that meditative stability, they will attain all-aspect omniscience through the wisdom of a single instant.”

58.29 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity after perfecting all pathways, is it the case, Blessed Lord, that the pathway of arhats on the eighth level is indeed one distinct path, that the pathway of those destined for only one more rebirth is another, [F.158.a] that the pathway of those no longer subject to rebirth is another, that the pathway of those entering arhatship is another, that the pathway of arhats is another, that the pathway of pratyekabuddhas is another, and that the pathway of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas is another? Blessed Lord, if these pathways are distinct from one another, how do bodhisattva great beings perfect all pathways and enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity? {Ki.V: 154} Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings perfect all pathways, do those bodhisattva great beings not become arhats of the eighth level after accomplishing the pathway of the eighth level? Do they not become one entering the stream to nirvāṇa after accomplishing the pathway of insight? Do they not become one entering into the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth after accomplishing the pathway of cultivation? Do they not become one entering the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or do they not become one established in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth? Do they not enter into arhatship, or do they not become arhats? Having accomplished the pathway of the pratyekabuddhas, do they not become pratyekabuddhas? Blessed Lord, after becoming arhats of the eighth level, there would be no opportunity for bodhisattva great beings to enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. That would be impossible! It is also impossible that they could attain all-aspect omniscience without having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas. And after attaining the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment, it is impossible that they could enter a bodhisattva's full maturity. If it is not possible to attain all-aspect omniscience without having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, in that case, Blessed Lord, how should one understand that bodhisattva great beings [F.158.b] perfect all pathways and enter a bodhisattva's full maturity? How do they attain all-aspect omniscience, having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, and how do they abandon all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities?"

58.30 "Subhūti, it is so! It is so," replied the Blessed One. "There is no opportunity for bodhisattva great beings, on becoming arhats of the eighth level, or after attaining the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, or attaining the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, or attaining the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or attaining arhatship, or attaining individual enlightenment, to enter a bodhisattva's full maturity. That would be impossible! It is also impossible that bodhisattva great beings could attain all-aspect omniscience without having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas. And yet, Subhūti, it is the case that when bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, practice the six perfections, they transcend eight levels through their cognition and insight. If you ask what are these eight, they comprise (1) the level of bright insight, (2) the level of the spiritual family, (3) the eighth-lowest level, (4) the level of insight, (5) the level of attenuated refinement, (6) the level of no attachment, (7) the level of an arhat's spiritual achievement, and (8) the level of the pratyekabuddhas. After transcending these eight levels that have been described through their cognition and insight, they then enter a bodhisattva's full maturity by means of understanding the path. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, {Ki.V: 155} they then abandon all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities by means of the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience.

58.31 "In this regard, Subhūti, the wisdom [and renunciation] of an arhat of the eighth level are indeed within what bodhisattva great beings accept. The wisdom and renunciation of one entering the stream to nirvāṇa are also within what bodhisattva great beings accept. [F.159.a] The wisdom and renunciation of one destined for only one more rebirth are also within what bodhisattva great beings accept. The wisdom and renunciation of one no longer subject to rebirth are also within what bodhisattva great beings accept. The wisdom and renunciation of an arhat are also within what bodhisattva great beings accept. The wisdom and renunciation of a pratyekabuddha are also within what bodhisattva great beings accept. In this way, having perfected the paths of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattva great beings enter a bodhisattva's full maturity by means of the wisdom of knowledge of the path. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, by means of all-aspect omniscience they abandon all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, after perfecting all paths, then attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and fruitfully sustain all beings." [B63]

58.32 "Blessed Lord, what is the pathway of knowledge of the path, distinct from the pathway of the śrāvakas, the pathway of the pratyekabuddhas, and the pathway of the buddhas?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "bodhisattva great beings should achieve the pure knowledge of the path. In this regard, the pure knowledge of the path is as follows: Bodhisattva great beings should attain consummate buddhahood with respect to those aspects, marks, and signs that express the path. Having attained consummate buddhahood, [F.159.b] they should by all means proclaim, reveal, explain, make known, and establish them for the sake of others, so that others might understand them and be disciplined. To that end, in order to make them become known, like an echo, bodhisattva great beings should communicate in and acquire all the languages and symbols that are understood in the world system of the great trichiliocosm.

58.33 "For this reason, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should perfect all paths. Having perfected all paths, they should be aware of the mindsets of all beings. That is to say, they should know the path, they should know the causal basis [of the path], and they should know the result [of the path] that leads the denizens of the hells to the hells, and thereby they should indeed avert beings from the path of the denizens of the hells. They should also avert them from its causal basis, and they should also avert them from its result. {Ki.V: 156}

58.34 "They should know the path, they should know the causal basis [of the path], and they should know the result [of the path] that leads the beings of the animal realm to be born in the animal realm, and thereby they should indeed avert beings from the path of the animal realm. They should also avert them from its causal basis, and they should also avert them from its result.

- 58.35 “They should know the path, they should know the causal basis [of the path], and they should know the result [of the path] that leads the beings of the world of Yama to the world of Yama, and thereby they should indeed avert beings from the path of the world of Yama. They should also avert them from its causal basis, and they should also avert them from its result.
- 58.36 “They should know the path, they should know the causal basis [of the path], and they should know the result [of the path] that leads to the domains of kinnaras, mahoragas, nāgas, yakṣas, humans, gods, and Brahma divinities. They should know the path, they should know the causal basis [of the path], and they should know the result [of the path] that leads to the gods of Ābhāsvara,⁵¹¹ the gods of Śubhakarṣna, the gods of Br̥hatphala, the beings of the realm of nonperception, the gods of Avṛha, the gods of Atapa, the gods of Sudṛśa, the gods of Sudarśana, [F.160.a] and the gods of Akaniṣṭha. They should know the path, they should know the causal basis [of the path], and they should know the result [of the path] that leads to the gods of the sphere of infinite space, the gods of the sphere of infinite consciousness, the gods of the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the gods of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception.
- 58.37 “They should know the four applications of mindfulness, and they should know the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They should know the four truths of the noble ones, and they should know the three gateways of liberation, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption. They should know the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion.
- 58.38 “They should establish in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa those who are to be established in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They should establish in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth those who are to be established in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth. They should establish in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth those who are to be established in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth. They should establish in arhatship those who are to be established in arhatship. They should establish in individual enlightenment those who are to be established in individual enlightenment. They should establish in enlightenment those who are to be established in enlightenment. {Ki.V: 157} This, Subhūti, is knowledge of the path that bodhisattva great beings have.

- 58.39 “Having trained in these attributes, bodhisattva great beings [F.160.b] enter into the mindsets of beings, and having entered into the mindsets of beings, they accordingly teach the Dharma in such a way that it does not become fruitless. If you ask why, it is because they have fully understood the faculties of others. They know the paths and nonpaths of beings, their deaths, and also their rebirths. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner. In this perfection of wisdom there is nothing at all that is not subsumed, including the factors conducive to enlightenment in which bodhisattva great beings should train, those in which śrāvakas should train, and those in which pratyekabuddhas should train.”
- 58.40 “Blessed Lord, if the factors that are conducive to enlightenment and all those attributes that constitute enlightenment are neither conjoined nor disjoined, immaterial, invisible, unimpeded, and their sole defining characteristic is that they are without defining characteristics, how do bodhisattva great beings nurture enlightenment? Blessed Lord, phenomena that are neither conjoined nor disjoined, immaterial, invisible, unimpeded, and with the sole defining characteristic that they are without defining characteristics cannot bring about or destroy anything at all, Blessed Lord, just as space does not bring about or destroy anything at all; in the same way, Blessed Lord, phenomena that are empty of their own defining characteristics cannot nurture or starve anything at all.”
- 58.41 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Phenomena that are empty of their own defining characteristics do not bring about or destroy anything at all. Subhūti, for the sake of those beings who do not know that phenomena are empty of their own defining characteristics, [F.161.a] it is explained that these factors conducive to enlightenment do lead to the attaining of enlightenment. However, Subhūti, all these phenomena [mentioned in] the Dharma and the Vinaya, comprising physical forms; comprising feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; comprising the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; comprising the perfection of generosity; comprising the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; comprising the emptiness of internal phenomena; comprising the emptiness of external phenomena; comprising the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, which comprise [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; comprising the first meditative concentration; comprising the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration; comprising loving kindness; comprising absorptions in compassion, empathetic joy, {Ki.V: 158} and equanimity; comprising absorption in the sphere of infinite space; comprising absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception; comprising the applications of mindfulness; comprising the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; comprising the truths of the noble ones, the three gateways of liberation, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; comprising the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion; [F.161.b] and comprising [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither conjoined nor disjoined, immaterial, invisible, unimpeded, and their sole defining characteristic is that they are without defining characteristics. These are just expressed in mundane conventional terms in order that beings might grasp them, but that is not the case in ultimate [truth].

58.42 “Bodhisattva great beings should train in all these through their cognition and insight. Having trained through definitive cognition and insight, there are some attributes that they should actualize, and some that they should not actualize. In this regard, if you ask which attributes bodhisattva great beings should actualize, having trained in them, and which attributes they should not actualize, they should not actualize the attributes of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, having trained in them through cognition and insight. On the other hand, they should actualize all attributes in all respects through the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. Subhūti, it is in this way that bodhisattva great beings should train in the perfection of wisdom that constitutes the Dharma and Vinaya of the noble ones.”

58.43 “The Blessed One speaks of the ‘Dharma and Vinaya of the noble ones.’⁵¹² What is the extent of the Dharma and Vinaya of the noble ones?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “śrāvakas, pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattva great beings, and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas neither have desire, nor are they without it. They neither have hatred, nor are they without it. They neither have delusion, nor are they without it. They neither have false views about perishable composites, nor are they without them. They neither have hesitation, nor are they without it. They neither have moral and ascetic supremacy, nor are they without them. They neither have attachment or malice for the realm of desire, nor are they without them. [F.162.a] They neither have attachment for the realms of form and formlessness, nor are they without it. They neither have ignorance, nor are they without it. They neither have pride {Ki.V: 159} or mental agitation, nor are they without them. They neither have the first meditative concentration, nor are they without it. They neither have the second meditative concentration, nor are they without it. They neither have the third meditative concentration, nor are they without it. They neither have the fourth meditative concentration, nor are they without it. They neither have loving kindness, nor are they without it. They neither have compassion, nor are they without it. They neither have empathetic joy, nor are they without it. They neither have equanimity, nor are they without it. They neither have absorption in the sphere of infinite space, nor are they without it. They neither have absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, nor are they without them. They neither have the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, nor are they without them. They neither have the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, nor are they without them. They neither have the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion, [F.162.b] nor are they without them. They neither have the conditioned elements and the unconditioned elements, nor are they without them. It is for this reason that they are called the noble ones. The expression Dharma and Vinaya of the noble ones denotes their Dharma and Vinaya.

58.44 “If you ask why, it is because all these phenomena are immaterial, invisible, unimpeded, and they have the sole defining characteristic that they are without defining characteristics. This means that they are immaterial, neither conjoined with the immaterial nor disjoined from it. They are invisible, neither conjoined with the invisible nor disjoined from it. They are unimpeded, neither conjoined with the unimpeded nor disjoined from it. They are without defining characteristics, neither conjoined with the absence of defining characteristics nor disjoined from it. This, Subhūti, is the transcendence of the immaterial, of the invisible, of the unimpeded, and of the sole defining characteristic that phenomena are without defining characteristics, which bodhisattva great beings have. Bodhisattva great beings should train in it. When they have trained in it, they do not apprehend the defining characteristic of anything at all.”

Subhūti then asked, “In that case, Blessed Lord, if they do not train in the defining characteristics of physical forms; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; {Ki.V:160} if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the perfection of generosity; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the emptiness of internal phenomena; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities; [F.163.a] if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the first meditative concentration; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of great loving kindness; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of great compassion, great empathetic joy, and great equanimity; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of absorption in the sphere of infinite space, absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the applications of mindfulness; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of great loving kindness; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of great compassion; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the noble truth of suffering; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the truths of the noble ones of the origin of suffering, the cessation [of suffering], and the path; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the links of dependent origination in their forward and reversed operation; and if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the conditioned elements; if they do not train in the defining characteristics of the unconditioned elements— [F.163.b] Blessed Lord, if they do not train in the defining characteristics of all these phenomena, how then, Blessed Lord, do bodhisattva great beings transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, without⁵¹³ having trained in the defining characteristics of all phenomena and in the defining characteristics of formative predispositions? If they do not transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, how do they enter a bodhisattva's full maturity? If they do not enter a bodhisattva's full maturity, how do they attain all-aspect omniscience? If they do not attain all-aspect omniscience, how do they turn the wheel of the Dharma? If they do not turn the wheel of the Dharma, how will they liberate beings from cyclic existence by means of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the Great Vehicle?" {Ki.V: 161}

58.46 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "if there were any phenomena with defining characteristics, bodhisattva great beings would train in those defining characteristics; however, all phenomena are without defining characteristics—immaterial, invisible, unimpeded, and with the sole defining characteristic that they are without defining characteristics. Therefore, bodhisattva great beings should indeed not train in defining characteristics. Nor should they train in the absence of defining characteristics. If you ask why, it is not the case that formerly phenomena had no defining characteristics and later did have defining characteristics. Subhūti, these phenomena even formerly were without defining characteristics, and right now they are also without defining characteristics. It is for this reason that bodhisattva great beings should not train in defining characteristics, nor should they train in the absence of defining characteristics. If you ask why, whether the tathāgatas have appeared or whether the tathāgatas have not appeared, this expanse without defining characteristics continues to dwell in that manner." [F.164.a]

58.47 "Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are in that manner without defining characteristics, and there is neither difference nor identity with respect to defining characteristics, how could the perfection of wisdom that bodhisattva great beings have be cultivated? Blessed Lord, without having cultivated the perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings cannot transcend the level of the śrāvakas or the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Without having transcended the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas, bodhisattva great beings cannot enter a bodhisattva's full maturity. Without having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, great bodhisattva beings cannot accept that phenomena are nonarising. Without having accepted that phenomena are nonarising, they cannot achieve the extrasensory powers. Without having achieved the extrasensory powers of the bodhisattvas, they cannot refine the buddhafiels and bring beings to maturity. Without having refined the buddhafiels and brought beings to maturity, they cannot attain all-aspect omniscience. Without having attained all-aspect omniscience, they cannot turn the wheel of the Dharma. Without having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they cannot establish beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and they cannot establish them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or in arhatship. They cannot establish them in individual enlightenment. They cannot establish them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They cannot establish beings in the foundation of meritorious deeds that originates from generosity. They cannot establish them in the foundation of meritorious deeds that originates from ethical discipline or in the foundation of meritorious deeds that originates from cultivation.” [F.164.b]

58.48 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, all phenomena are without defining characteristics, and there is neither difference nor identity with respect to defining characteristics.” {Ki.V: 162}

58.49 “If in that manner all phenomena are without defining characteristics, how will the perfection of wisdom be cultivated?”

“Bodhisattva great beings’ cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is without either difference or identity in terms of defining characteristics,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings’ cultivation of the perfection of wisdom is a cultivation without defining characteristics.”

58.50 “How is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom a cultivation without defining characteristics?”

“The cultivation of the breaking down of all phenomena constitutes the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom,” replied the Blessed One.

58.51 “Blessed Lord, how does the cultivation of the breaking down of all phenomena constitute the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?”

The Blessed One replied, “The cultivation of the breaking down of physical forms is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the eyes is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the ears, the nose, the tongue, the body, and the mental faculty is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of sights is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of sounds, odors, tastes, tangibles, and mental phenomena is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of visual consciousness is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, [F.165.a] gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, and mental consciousness is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of visually compounded sensory contact is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of aurally compounded sensory contact, nasally compounded sensory contact, lingually compounded sensory contact, corporeally compounded sensory contact, and mentally compounded sensory contact is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of feelings conditioned by aurally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by nasally compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by lingually compounded sensory contact, feelings conditioned by corporeally compounded sensory contact, and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the earth element is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.52 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the links of dependent origination is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of ignorance is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, and aging and death is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of phenomena to be adopted is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of phenomena to be forsaken is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. {Ki.V: 163} [F.165.b]

58.53 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the first meditative concentration is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of loving kindness is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of absorption in the sphere of infinite space is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.54 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the recollection of the Buddha is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the recollection of the Dharma, the recollection of the Saṅgha, the recollection of ethical discipline, the recollection of giving away, the recollection of the god realms, the recollection of disillusionment, the recollection of breathing, the recollection of death, and the recollection of the body is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.55 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the perception of impermanence is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the perception of suffering, the perception of nonself, the perception of unattractiveness, the perception of nonentities, the perception of self, the perception of beings, the perception of life forms, the perception of living beings, the perception of life, the perception of living creatures, the perception of individual personalities, the perception of human beings, the perception of people, the perception of actors, the perception of experiencers, [F.166.a] the perception of knowers, and the perception of viewers is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the perception of permanence is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the perception of happiness, the perception of attractiveness, and the perception of self is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.56 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the applications of mindfulness is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the eight aspects of liberation and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the meditative stability endowed with ideation and scrutiny, and the meditative stability devoid of both ideation and scrutiny, is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the noble truth of suffering is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the noble truth of the origin of suffering, the noble truth of the cessation [of suffering], and the noble truth of the path is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the knowledge of suffering, the knowledge of the origin of suffering, the knowledge of the cessation of suffering, and knowledge of the path is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.57 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the knowledge of the extinction of contaminants is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the knowledge that contaminants will not arise again, {Ki.V: 164} the knowledge of phenomena, the knowledge of phenomena that is subsequently realized, the knowledge of the relative, [F.166.b] the knowledge that is masterful, and the knowledge that is semantic is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.58 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the perfection of generosity is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the emptiness of internal phenomena is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the emptiness of external phenomena and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the six extrasensory powers is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of all the meditative stabilities is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of all the dhāraṇī gateways is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of great loving kindness and great compassion is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.

58.59 “The cultivation of the breaking down of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of individual enlightenment is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. [F.167.a] The cultivation of the breaking down of [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom. The cultivation of the breaking down of the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities is the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom.”

- 58.60 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, how is the cultivation of the breaking down of physical forms the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom? How is the cultivation of the breaking down of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom? How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom? How is the cultivation of the breaking down of phenomena to be adopted and phenomena to be forsaken the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?
- 58.61 “How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, the fourth meditative concentration, loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, equanimity, absorption in the sphere of infinite space, absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?
- 58.62 “How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the recollection of the Buddha, the recollection of the Dharma, the recollection of the Saṅgha, the recollection of ethical discipline, the recollection of giving away, the recollection of the god realms, the recollection of disillusionment, the recollection of breathing, the recollection of death, and the recollection of the body the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?
- 58.63 “How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering, [F.167.b] the perception of nonself, the perception of unattractiveness, the perception of nonentities, the perception of self, the perception of beings, the perception of life forms, the perception of living beings, the perception of life, the perception of living creatures, the perception of individual personalities, the perception of human beings, the perception of people, the perception of actors, the perception of experiencers, the perception of knowers, and the perception of viewers the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom? How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the perception of permanence, the perception of happiness, the perception of attractiveness, and the perception of self the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?

stability devoid of ideation and endowed with some scrutiny, and the meditative stability devoid of both ideation and scrutiny the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom? How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the six extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, all the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?

58.66 “How is the cultivation of the breaking down of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, {Ki.V: 165} the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, [the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom]? And how is the cultivation of the breaking down of the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom?”

58.67 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not cultivate the notion that physical forms are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that phenomena to be adopted and phenomena to be forsaken are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, the fourth meditative concentration, loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, equanimity, absorption in the sphere of infinite space, absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception are entities. [F.168.b] They do not cultivate the notion that the recollection of the Buddha, the recollection of the Dharma, the recollection of the Saṅgha, the recollection of ethical discipline, the recollection of giving away, the recollection of the god realms, the recollection of disillusionment, the recollection of breathing, the recollection of death, and the recollection of the body are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering, the perception of nonself, the perception of unattractiveness, the perception of nonentities, the perception of self, the perception of beings, the perception of life forms, the perception of living beings, the perception of life, the perception of living creatures, the perception of individual personalities, the perception of human beings, the perception of people, the perception of actors, the perception of experiencers, the perception of knowers, and the perception of viewers are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the perception of permanence, the perception of happiness, the perception of attractiveness, and the perception of self are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the factors conducive to enlightenment are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the meditative stability endowed with ideation and scrutiny, the meditative stability devoid of ideation and endowed with some scrutiny, and the meditative stability devoid of both ideation and scrutiny are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the noble truth of suffering, the noble truth of the origin of suffering, the noble truth of the cessation [of suffering], the noble truth of the path, the knowledge of suffering, the knowledge of the origin of suffering, the knowledge of the cessation of suffering, knowledge of the path, the knowledge of the extinction of contaminants, the knowledge that contaminants will not arise again, the knowledge of phenomena, the knowledge of phenomena that is subsequently realized, [F.169.a] the knowledge of the relative, the knowledge that is masterful, and the knowledge that is semantic are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that all the perfections and all the aspects of emptiness are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the six extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, all the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion are entities. They do not cultivate the notion that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, and the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities are entities.

58.68 “If you ask why, Subhūti, those who have the perception of entities do not cultivate the perfection of wisdom. Those who have the perception of entities do not cultivate the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, or the perfection of generosity. Those who have the perception of entities are without [those other attributes and goals], up to and including the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities. If you ask why, it is because in the perception of themselves as an entity they become attached to the two extremes. In the perception of themselves in relation to generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom and [the other attributes and goals], up to and including the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, they become attached to the two extremes. Those who in this manner become attached to the two extremes will not be liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, if those who have the perception of entities are without generosity, [F.169.b] without ethical discipline, without tolerance, without perseverance, without meditative concentration, and without wisdom, and they lack comprehension with respect to [all the attributes and goals], up to and including the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, how could they possibly be liberated?”⁵¹⁴

58.69 “Blessed Lord what are entities? What are nonentities?”

“Subhūti, entities are dualistic. Nonentities are nondualistic,” replied the Blessed One.

58.70 “Blessed Lord, with respect to what are entities dualistic?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the perception of physical forms is dualistic. The perception of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness is dualistic. The perception of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination is dualistic. {Ki.V: 166} The perception of phenomena to be adopted and phenomena to be forsaken is dualistic. The perception of the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, the fourth meditative concentration, loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, equanimity, absorption in the sphere of infinite space, absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception is dualistic. The perception of the recollection of the Buddha, the recollection of the Dharma, the recollection of the Saṅgha, the recollection of ethical discipline, the recollection of giving away, the recollection of the god realms, the recollection of disillusionment, the recollection of breathing, the recollection of death, and the recollection of the body are dualistic. The perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering, the perception of nonself, [F.170.a] the perception of unattractiveness, the perception of nonentities, the perception of self, the perception of beings, the perception of life forms, the perception of living beings, the perception of life, the perception of living creatures, the perception of individual personalities, the perception of human beings, the perception of people, the perception of actors, the perception of experiencers, the perception of knowers, and the perception of viewers is dualistic. The perception of permanence, the perception of happiness, the perception of attractiveness, and the perception of self is dualistic. The perception of the factors conducive to enlightenment is dualistic. The perception of the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption is dualistic. The perception of the meditative stability endowed with ideation and scrutiny, the meditative stability devoid of ideation and endowed with some scrutiny, and the meditative stability devoid of both ideation and scrutiny is dualistic. The perception of the noble truth of suffering, the noble truth of the origin of suffering, the noble truth of the cessation [of suffering], the noble truth of the path, the knowledge of suffering, the knowledge of the origin of suffering, the knowledge of the cessation of suffering, knowledge of the path, the knowledge of the extinction of contaminants, the knowledge that contaminants will not arise again, the knowledge of phenomena, the knowledge of phenomena that is subsequently realized, the knowledge of the relative, the knowledge that is masterful, and the knowledge that is semantic is dualistic. The perception of all the perfections and all the aspects of emptiness is dualistic. The perception of the six extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, all the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [F.170.b] the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion is dualistic. The perception of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, being destined for only one more rebirth, no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and buddhahood is dualistic. The perception of conditioned elements and the perception of unconditioned elements are dualistic. Subhūti, all those phenomena that are imbued with perception are dualistic and all those phenomena that are devoid of perception are dualistic. To the extent that phenomena are dualistic, there are entities. To the extent that there are entities, there is cyclic existence. To the extent that there is cyclic existence, beings are not liberated from birth, aging, ill health, death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, discomfort, and agitation.

58.71 “Nonattention to all these perceptions is nondualistic. It is for this reason also, Subhūti, that one should know that those with dualistic perception are without generosity, without ethical discipline, without tolerance, without perseverance, without meditative concentration, without wisdom, without the path, without attainment, and without clear realization.

58.72 “Subhūti, if those with dualistic perception do not have even a little of the appropriate receptivity, how could they possibly comprehend physical forms? How could they comprehend feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? How could they comprehend the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination? How could they comprehend phenomena to be adopted and phenomena to be forsaken? How could they comprehend the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, the fourth meditative concentration, loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, equanimity, absorption in the sphere of infinite space, [F.171.a] absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception? How could they comprehend the recollection of the Buddha, the recollection of the Dharma, the recollection of the Saṅgha, the recollection of ethical discipline, the recollection of giving away, the recollection of the god realms, the recollection of disillusionment, the recollection of breathing, the recollection of death, and the recollection of the body? How could they comprehend the perception of impermanence, the perception of suffering, the perception of nonself, the perception of unattractiveness, the perception of nonentities, the perception of self, the perception of beings, the perception of life forms, the perception of living beings, the perception of life, the perception of living creatures, the perception of individual personalities, the perception of human beings, the perception of people, the perception of actors, the perception of experiencers, the perception of knowers, and the perception of viewers? How could they comprehend the perception of permanence, the perception of happiness, the perception of attractiveness, and the perception of self? How could they comprehend the factors conducive to enlightenment? How could they comprehend the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption? How could they comprehend the meditative stability endowed with ideation and scrutiny, the meditative stability devoid of ideation and endowed with some scrutiny, and the meditative stability devoid of both ideation and scrutiny? [F.171.b] How could they comprehend the noble truth of suffering, the noble truth of the origin of suffering, the noble truth of the cessation [of suffering], the noble truth of the path, the knowledge of suffering, the knowledge of the origin of suffering, the knowledge of the cessation of suffering, knowledge of the path, the knowledge of the extinction of contaminants, the knowledge that contaminants will not arise again, the knowledge of phenomena, the knowledge of phenomena that is subsequently realized, the knowledge of the relative, the knowledge that is masterful, and the knowledge that is semantic? How could they comprehend all the perfections and all the aspects of emptiness? How could they comprehend the six extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, all the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, and great compassion? How could they comprehend the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience?

58.73 “How could those who have not cultivated the path have the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa? How could they have the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience? How could they have the abandonment of all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities?”

58.74 This completes the fifty-eighth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 59

59.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if those with perception of entities lack even the appropriate receptivity, [F.172.a] and cannot possibly have attainment, and cannot possibly have clear realization, in that case, Blessed Lord, do those with the perception of nonentities possess compatible receptivity, {Ki.V: 167} or the level of bright insight, the level of the spiritual family, the eighth-lowest level, the level of insight, the level of attenuated refinement, the level of no attachment, the level of [an arhat’s] spiritual achievement, the level of the pratyekabuddhas, the level of the bodhisattvas, the level of the buddhas, or a path dependent on which they could abandon the afflicted mental states that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have, and obscured by which they do not enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity, and do not attain all-aspect omniscience because they have not entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, and are obscured without abandoning all the afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities since they have not attained all-aspect omniscience? Blessed Lord, if there is no arising at all of any attributes that might arise, how could they attain all-aspect omniscience without developing those attributes?”

59.2 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Those with the perception of nonentities are without the appropriate receptivity. They are without the level of clear realization. They are without the level of bright insight. They are without the level of the spiritual family. They are without the eighth-lowest level. They are without the level of insight. They are without the level of attenuated refinement. They are without the level of no attachment. They are without the level of [an arhat’s] spiritual achievement. They are without the level of the pratyekabuddhas. They are without the level of the bodhisattvas. They are without the level of the buddhas, and they are without a path dependent on which they could abandon the afflicted mental states that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have, and obscured by which they do not enter a bodhisattva's full maturity, [F.172.b] and do not attain all-aspect omniscience because they have not entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, and are obscured, not abandoning all the afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities since they have not attained all-aspect omniscience."

59.3 "Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, do they have the perception of entities or do they have the perception of nonentities? Do they have the perception of physical forms? Do they have the perception of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? Do they have the perception of the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination? Do they have the perception of desire, the perception of abandoning desire, the perception of hatred, the perception of abandoning hatred, the perception of delusion, and the perception of abandoning delusion?

59.4 "Do they have the perception of ignorance, the perception of abandoning ignorance, the perception of formative predispositions, the perception of abandoning formative predispositions, the perception of consciousness, the perception of abandoning consciousness, the perception of name and form, the perception of abandoning name and form, the perception of the six sense fields, the perception of abandoning the six sense fields, the perception of sensory contact, the perception of abandoning sensory contact, the perception of sensation, the perception of abandoning sensation, {Ki.V: 168} the perception of craving, the perception of abandoning craving, the perception of grasping, the perception of abandoning grasping, the perception of the rebirth process, the perception of abandoning the rebirth process, the perception of actual birth, the perception of abandoning actual birth, the perception of aging and death, the perception of abandoning aging and death, the perception of sorrow and lamentation, and the perception of abandoning sorrow and lamentation? [F.173.a]

59.5 "Do they have the perception of suffering, the perception that all suffering is to be known, the perception of the origin of suffering, the perception that the origin of suffering is to be abandoned, the perception of the cessation [of suffering], the perception that the cessation [of suffering] is to be actualized, the perception of the path, and the perception that the path is to be cultivated?

59.6 "Do they have the perception of all-aspect omniscience, or [other perceptions], up to and including the perception of abandoning all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities?"

59.7 “No, Subhūti! That is not the case!” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they are without the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities with respect to anything at all. That very state in which they are without the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities is the appropriate receptivity of bodhisattva great beings. That very state in which they are without the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities is the cultivation of the path. That very state in which they are without the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities is the fruit. Subhūti, the path of bodhisattva great beings is nonentity. Clear realization is also nonentity. For this reason, Subhūti, one should know that all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity.”

59.8 “Blessed Lord, if in that manner all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, in that case, Blessed Lord, how do the tathāgatas attain consummate buddhahood with respect to all phenomena that are of the essential nature of nonentity? How, by attaining consummate buddhahood, do they acquire sovereignty over their perceptual range, which is sovereignty over all phenomena?” [F.173.b]

59.9 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti, “In this regard, Subhūti, when I was formerly engaged in the conduct of a bodhisattva, practicing the six perfections, I achieved and maintained the first meditative concentration, where there is freedom from desires, and freedom from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, while ideation and scrutiny are present, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. I achieved and maintained [the other meditative concentrations], up to and including the fourth meditative concentration. But I did not grasp the signs of these meditative concentrations or the ancillary aspects of these meditative concentrations. I did not give rise to conceits on account of those meditative concentrations. I did not relish the taste of meditative concentration. I did not apprehend meditative concentration. In that manner I became absorbed in these meditative concentrations and their pure aspects. In that manner I brought those meditative concentrations to maturity, and henceforth I would focus my mind on actualizing the different modes of the knowledge of clairvoyance. I would focus my mind on actualizing the knowledge of cliraudience. I would focus my mind on actualizing the knowledge of other minds. I would focus my mind on actualizing the knowledge of recollecting past lives.⁵¹⁵ [Ki.V: 169] However, I did not conceptualize those extrasensory powers that were to be brought into being. I was not cognizant of these extrasensory powers. I did not relish their taste, and I did not apprehend them. I remained absorbed, recollecting that these five extrasensory powers resemble space. In this way I attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment through the wisdom of a single instant, and then I definitively comprehended that this is suffering, this is the origin [of suffering], this is the cessation of suffering, [F.174.a] and this is the path that brings about the cessation of suffering. So it was that I acquired the ten powers of the tathāgatas, and I acquired the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, consequent on which I could then predict the three categories into which beings would fall.”⁵¹⁶

59.10 “Blessed Lord, how did the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha develop the four meditative concentrations, which are of the essential nature of nonentity? How did he develop the six perfections, the extrasensory powers, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? How did he prophetically declare that beings are classed according to three categories, although beings do not exist?”

59.11 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if desires and negative, nonvirtuous attributes had an entity, had an essential nature, or had some extraneous entity, then, Subhūti, when I formerly practiced the conduct of a bodhisattva, I would not even have achieved and maintained the four meditative concentrations, knowing that desires are of the essential nature of nonentity and that negative, nonvirtuous attributes are of the essential nature of nonentity. So, Subhūti, since desires and negative, nonvirtuous attributes are without entity, without essential nature, and without extraneous entity, and moreover their essential nature is nonentity, for that reason, Subhūti, when I practiced the conduct of a bodhisattva, I achieved and maintained the first meditative concentration, where there is freedom from desires, and freedom from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, while ideation and scrutiny are present, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. [F.174.b] I achieved and maintained [the other meditative concentrations], up to and including the fourth meditative concentration.

59.12 “Subhūti, if the extrasensory powers had an entity, had an essential nature, or had some extraneous entity, then, Subhūti, I would not even have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, knowing that all the extrasensory powers are of the essential nature of nonentity. So, Subhūti, since the extrasensory powers are without entity, without essential nature, and without extraneous entity, and moreover, since their essential nature is nonentity, it is for this reason that I, as a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha, comprehended that all the extrasensory powers are of the essential nature of nonentity, and attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”⁵¹⁷ {Ki.VI: 1}

59.13 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings in that manner attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment by means of the four meditative concentrations and the five extrasensory powers, although all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity, why is it, Blessed Lord, that bodhisattva great beings undertake the serial practice, serial training, and serial progression through which they will attain manifest perfect buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, despite the fact that all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity?” [B64]

59.14 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings [F.175.a] hear in the beginning from the lord buddhas, bodhisattva great beings, arhats who revere many buddhas, those who are no longer subject to rebirth, those who are destined for only one more rebirth, and those entering the stream to nirvāṇa that the lord buddhas have the essential nature of nonentity, that bodhisattva great beings have the essential nature of nonentity, that pratyekabuddhas have the essential nature of nonentity, that arhats have the essential nature of nonentity, that those who are no longer subject to rebirth have the essential nature of nonentity, that those who are destined for only one more rebirth have the essential nature of nonentity, that those entering the stream to nirvāṇa have the essential nature of nonentity, that all the noble ones have the essential nature of nonentity, and that, at the very least, formative predispositions are without any essential nature at all, even to the extent of a hair-tip, whereupon those bodhisattva great beings think, ‘If even the lord buddhas have the essential nature of nonentity, and bodhisattva great beings, arhats, those who are destined for only one more rebirth, and those entering the stream to nirvāṇa have the essential nature of nonentity, in that case, whether I attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, or whether I do not attain consummate buddhahood, I should attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment based on the fact that all phenomena are without essential nature, and then by whatever means I should establish all beings who engage in the perception of entities in nonentity.’

59.15 “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings manifestly set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment in order that all beings might attain final nirvāṇa. [F.175.b] They should undertake the serial practice, serial training, {Ki.VI: 2} and serial progress in which bodhisattva great beings of the past have trained and attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

59.16 “In the beginning they should practice the six perfections, namely, the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom.

59.17 “When they practice the perfection of generosity, they themselves dispense gifts, and they also establish others in generosity. They praise generosity and also praise and take empathetic delight in other beings dispensing gifts. Having acquired great felicity through that generosity, they should dispense their gifts with a mind that is free from faults and free from miserliness. They dispense their gifts in the following way: they give food to those who need food, drink to those who need drink, transport to those who need transport, clothing to those who need clothing, incense to those who need incense, garlands to those who need garlands, unguents to those who need unguents, bedding to those who need bedding, asylum to those who need asylum, lamps who need lamps, and [everything else], up to and including any of the necessities of humankind, whatever they happen to be.

59.18 “On the basis of that generosity they perfect the aggregate of ethical discipline, and they acquire an exalted status among gods and an exalted status among human beings. On the basis of that generosity and ethical discipline, they acquire the aggregate of meditative stability. On the basis of that generosity, ethical discipline, and meditative stability, [F.176.a] they acquire the aggregate of wisdom. On the basis of that generosity, ethical discipline, meditative stability, and wisdom, they acquire the aggregate of liberation. On the basis of that generosity, ethical discipline, meditative stability, wisdom, and liberation, they acquire the aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation. On the basis of that generosity, ethical discipline, meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation, they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and then enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they refine the buddhafiels, bring beings to maturity, and attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they establish beings individually in the three vehicles, and liberate them from cyclic existence. It is in this way, Subhūti, that although bodhisattva great beings do have their serial practice of generosity, all of it is nonapprehended. {Ki.VI: 3} If you ask why, it is because it is in this way without essential nature.

59.19 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, themselves practice the perfection of ethical discipline, and they also encourage others toward the perfection of ethical discipline. They praise the perfection of ethical discipline, and also praise and take empathetic delight in others practicing the perfection of ethical discipline. They acquire an exalted status among gods and an exalted status among human beings. They give wealth to beings who are without wealth, and establish them in ethical discipline. They establish them in ethical discipline, [F.176.b] meditative stability, wisdom, liberation and seeing the wisdom of liberation. On the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they refine the buddhafiels, bring beings to maturity, and then attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they establish beings individually in the three vehicles, and liberate them from cyclic existence. Thus, Subhūti, although bodhisattva great beings do have their serial practice of ethical discipline, all of it is nonapprehended. If you ask why, it is because it is in this way without essential nature.

59.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, themselves practice the perfection of tolerance, and they also encourage others toward the perfection of tolerance. They praise the perfection of tolerance, and also praise and take empathetic delight in others practicing the perfection of tolerance. When they practice the perfection of tolerance, they satisfy beings with gifts, establish them in ethical discipline, and establish them in meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, [F.177.a] that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and {Ki.VI: 4} that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they refine the buddhafiels, bring beings to maturity, and then attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they establish beings individually in the three vehicles, and liberate them from cyclic existence. Thus, Subhūti, although bodhisattva great beings do have their serial practice of tolerance, all of it is nonapprehended. If you ask why, it is because it is in this way without essential nature.

59.21 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, themselves undertake perseverance with respect to virtuous attributes, and they also encourage others toward perseverance. They praise perseverance, and also praise and take empathetic delight in others undertaking perseverance. When they practice the perfection of perseverance, they satisfy beings with gifts, establish them in ethical discipline, and establish them in meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, [F.177.b] that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they refine the buddhafiels, bring beings to maturity, and then attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they establish beings individually in the three vehicles, and liberate them from cyclic existence. Thus, Subhūti, although bodhisattva great beings do have their serial practice of perseverance, all of it is nonapprehended. If you ask why, it is because it is in this way without essential nature. {Ki.VI: 5}

59.22 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, themselves become absorbed in the immeasurable attitudes, the meditative concentrations, and the formless absorptions, and they also encourage others toward the immeasurable attitudes, the meditative concentrations, and the formless absorptions. They praise the immeasurable attitudes, the meditative concentrations, and the formless absorptions, and also praise and take empathetic delight in others becoming absorbed in the immeasurable attitudes, the meditative concentrations, and the formless absorptions. When they maintain the immeasurable attitudes, the meditative concentrations, and the formless absorptions, they satisfy beings with gifts, establish them in ethical discipline, [F.178.a] and establish them in meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Then, on the basis of that aggregate of ethical discipline, that aggregate of meditative stability, that aggregate of wisdom, that aggregate of liberation, and that aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation, they enter a bodhisattva's full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they refine the buddhafiels, bring beings to maturity, and then attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they establish beings individually in the three vehicles, and liberate them from cyclic existence. Thus, Subhūti, although bodhisattva great beings do have their serial practice of meditative concentration, all of it is nonapprehended. If you ask why, it is because it is in this way without essential nature.

59.23 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, practice the perfection of wisdom, they satisfy beings with gifts, establish them in ethical discipline, and establish them in meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation. When they practice the perfection of wisdom, they themselves dispense gifts, maintain ethical discipline, achieve tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and [F.178.b] cultivate wisdom, and they also establish others in generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom. They praise generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom, and also praise and take empathetic delight in others dispensing gifts, maintain ethical discipline, achieve tolerance, undertake perseverance, become absorbed in meditative concentration, and cultivate wisdom. When they practice the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, through skill in means {Ki.VI: 6} they transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and then they enter a bodhisattva's full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they refine the buddhafiels, bring beings to maturity, and then attain all-aspect omniscience. Having attained all-aspect omniscience, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they establish beings individually in the three vehicles, and liberate them from cyclic existence. Thus, Subhūti, although bodhisattva great beings do have their serial practice of wisdom, all of it is nonapprehended. If you ask why, it is because it is in this way without essential nature.

59.24 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should train in serial practice, serial training, and serial progress. When they initially set their minds on enlightenment, through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind they realize that all phenomena [F.179.a] have the essential nature of nonentity. They should cultivate the recollection of the Buddha. They should cultivate the recollection of the Dharma, the recollection of the Saṅgha, the recollection of ethical discipline, the recollection of giving away, and the recollection of the god realms.

59.25 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings should cultivate the recollection of the Buddha, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings do not focus their attention on the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas because of physical forms. They do not focus their attention on them because of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. If you ask why, it is because physical forms are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness forms are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, it is because being without recollection and being without attention is the recollection of the Buddha.

59.26 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings cultivate the recollection of the Buddha, they do not focus their attention on the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas because of the thirty-two major marks of a great person. They do not focus attention on them because of the golden complexion of their bodies, {Ki.VI: 7} and they do not focus attention on them because of their aureoles, extending a full arm span. They do not focus attention on them because of the eighty minor marks. If you ask why, it is because these are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, it is because being without recollection and being without attention is the recollection of the Buddha.

59.27 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings cultivate the recollection of the Buddha, they do not focus their attention on the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas because of the aggregate of ethical discipline. [F.179.b] They do not focus their attention on them because of the aggregate of meditative stability, the aggregate of wisdom, the aggregate of liberation, or the aggregate of seeing the wisdom of liberation. If you ask why, it is because these are without essential nature.

That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, it is because being without recollection and being without attention is the recollection of the Buddha.

59.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings cultivate the recollection of the Buddha, they do not focus their attention on the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas because of the ten powers of the tathāgatas. They do not focus their attention on them because of the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. If you ask why, it is because these are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, it is because being without recollection and being without attention is the recollection of the Buddha.

59.29 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings cultivate the recollection of the Buddha, they do not focus their attention on the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas because of the links of dependent origination. If you ask why, it is because these are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, it is because being without recollection and being without attention is the recollection of the Buddha. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should cultivate the recollection of the Buddha, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity.

59.30 “It is in this way that serial practice, [F.180.a] serial training, and serial progress are discerned. Those who train in serial practice, and who train in serial training and serial progress, will, on the basis of the essential nature of nonentity, perfect all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They will perfect the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, and the nine serial steps of meditative absorption. They will perfect the meditative stability of emptiness, the meditative stability of signlessness, {Ki.VI: 8} and the meditative stability of wishlessness. They will perfect the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, and great compassion. They will perfect the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and they will perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Since the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities are both nonexistent in it, how could there possibly be even a speck of actions based on recollection, or without recollection!

59.31 “Subhūti, if one were to ask how bodhisattva great beings should cultivate the recollection of the Dharma, in that case, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, in cultivating the recollection of the Dharma, [F.180.b] they should not focus their attention on virtuous phenomena. They should not focus their attention on nonvirtuous phenomena. They should not focus their attention on mundane phenomena, supramundane phenomena, worldly phenomena, nonworldly phenomena, noble phenomena, ignoble phenomena, contaminated phenomena, uncontaminated phenomena, phenomena included in the realm of desire, phenomena included in the realm of form, phenomena included in the realm of formlessness, conditioned phenomena, or unconditioned phenomena. If you ask why, it is because these phenomena are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, the recollection of the Dharma is without recollection and without attention. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who have trained in that recollection of the Dharma will perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, on the basis of the essential nature of nonentity. They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Since the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities are both nonexistent in it, how could there possibly be even a speck of actions based on recollection, or without recollection!

59.32 “Subhūti, if one were to ask how bodhisattva great beings should cultivate the recollection of the Saṅgha, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, in cultivating the recollection of the Saṅgha, they should focus their attention on the community of the śrāvakas of the Blessed One, comprising the four pairs of persons and eight types of individuals who are all endowed with the excellences of ethical discipline, meditative stability, wisdom, liberation, and seeing the wisdom of liberation, on the basis that they are of the essential nature of nonentity. [F.181.a] If you ask why, it is because these [persons and types of individuals] are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, the recollection of the Saṅgha is without recollection and without attention. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who have trained in that recollection of the Saṅgha will perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, on the basis of the essential nature of nonentity. {Ki.VI: 9} They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Since the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities are both nonexistent in it, how could there possibly be even a speck of actions based on recollection, or without recollection!

59.33 “Subhūti, if one were to ask how bodhisattva great beings should cultivate the recollection of ethical discipline, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, in cultivating the recollection of ethical discipline, they should maintain the ethical discipline of consummate meditative stability that is undamaged, unbroken, unblemished, flawless, nondegenerate, potent, praised by the wise, and utterly perfect, and they should focus their attention on this ethical discipline being of the essential nature of nonentity. If you ask why, it is because this [ethical discipline] is without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, the recollection of ethical discipline is without recollection and without attention. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who have trained in that recollection of ethical discipline will perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, on the basis of the essential nature of nonentity. [F.181.b] They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Since the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities are both nonexistent in it, how could there possibly be even a speck of actions based on recollection, or without recollection!

59.34 “Subhūti, if one were to ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they should recollect giving away, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, in cultivating the recollection of giving away, they should not focus their attention on giving away material things or giving away dharmas. Even when giving away their limbs and appendages, let alone other material objects, even when dispensing their generosity in that manner, they should not think, ‘I am giving gifts away. This thing is being given away. It should be given away to this [person].’ If you ask why, it is because these nonentities are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, the recollection of giving away is without recollection and without attention. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who have trained in that recollection of giving away will perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, on the basis of the essential nature of nonentity. They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. In that regard, since the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities are both nonexistent, how could there possibly be even a speck of actions based on recollection, or without recollection! {Ki.VI: 10}

59.35 “Subhūti, one might ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, [F.182.a] they should recollect the god realms. In cultivating the recollection of the god realms, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, with regard to those who are born among the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm, the Trayastrimśa realm, the Yāma realm, the Tuṣita realm, the Nirmāṇarata realm, and the Paranirmitavaśavartin realm, as well as those frequenting the realm of form and those no longer subject to rebirth who frequent the realm of formlessness, should focus their attention on them on the basis that these are of the essential nature of nonentity. If you ask why, it is because these [god realms] are without essential nature. That which is without essential nature is a nonentity. Nonentities cannot recollect nonentities. If you ask why, the recollection of the god realms is without recollection and without attention. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who have trained in that recollection of the god realms will perfect [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Since the perception of entities and the perception of nonentities are both nonexistent in it, how could there possibly be even a speck of actions based on recollection, or without recollection!

59.36 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, those who wish to perfect the path of the serial practice, serial training, and serial progress should, through focusing their attention with all-aspect omniscience in mind and on the basis of the essential nature of nonentity, train in the perfection of generosity. They should train in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, [F.182.b] the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. They should train in the emptiness of internal phenomena. They should train in the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They should train in the applications of mindfulness. They should train in the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the path. They should train in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They should train in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

59.37 “Subhūti, in that manner bodhisattva great beings engage in serial practice, serial training, and serial progression, training in the essential nature of nonentity with respect to all phenomena. By training in the path of serial practice, serial training, and serial progression, bodhisattva great beings complete the perfection of generosity. On the basis of the essential nature of nonentity, they complete the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom. [F.183.a] They complete [all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They will attain consummate buddhahood, [knowing that] all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Since there are no entities in them, how could there possibly exist physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, {Ki.VI: 11} any perfections, any aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, or [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience? How could there possibly exist the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience? That would be impossible!”

59.38 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if in that manner all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, in that case, there are indeed no physical forms. There are indeed no feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. There are indeed no sense fields, sensory elements, or dependent origination, nor are there any links of dependent origination. [F.183.b] There are no perfections, none of the aspects of emptiness, and no thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. There are no truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or even the distinct qualities of the buddhas. There are no [goals], up to and including the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience.

59.39 “There are also no buddhas, Dharma, or saṅgha. There is indeed no path, no fruit, no afflicted mental state, no purification, no attainment, and no clear realization. There are no phenomena at all.”

59.40 The Blessed One then asked, “Subhūti, do you think that it is apprehensible whether all phenomena have or do not have an essential nature of nonentity?”

“No, Blessed Lord!” replied Subhūti. “It is not apprehensible whether all phenomena have or do not have an essential nature of nonentity.”

59.41 “In that case, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “if all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, why do you think that there are indeed no physical forms; no feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; no sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination; no perfections, aspects of emptiness, or factors conducive to enlightenment; and no truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, [F.184.a] immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or distinct qualities of the buddhas? Why do you think there are no [goals], up to and including the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience; no buddhas, Dharma, or saṅgha; and no path, no fruit, {Ki.VI: 12} no afflicted mental states, no purification, no attainment, and no clear realization—nothing at all?”

59.42 “Blessed Lord,” replied Subhūti, “I am without doubt and I am without hesitation regarding all these phenomena. However, Blessed Lord, in the future there will be monks following the vehicle of the śrāvakas, following the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, or following the vehicle of the bodhisattvas who will say, ‘If all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, who will be defiled or purified when all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity?’ Since they will not understand affliction and purification, they will resort to immorality, mistaken views, misconduct, and wrong livelihood. Those who resort to immorality, mistaken views, misconduct, and wrong livelihood will be reborn in one of the three lower realms—the hells, the animal realm, or the world of Yama. Blessed Lord, seeing these fears that have not yet arisen, [F.184.b] I ask the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened Buddha about this matter, although, Blessed Lord, I am without doubt and without hesitation regarding these phenomena.”

59.43 The Blessed One replied, “Excellent, Subhūti! Excellent. It is as you have said.”

59.44 This completes the fifty-ninth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 60

- 60.1 The venerable Subhūti further asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity, what is the goal that bodhisattva great beings see in embarking on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of beings?”
- 60.2 The Blessed One replied, “Subhūti, in the way that all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity, in that way too do bodhisattva great beings embark on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because apprehending is feeble.⁵¹⁸ Those possessing the notion of apprehending are without attainment, without clear realization, and without unsurpassed complete enlightenment.”
- 60.3 “Blessed Lord, with regard to nonapprehension, is there attainment, clear realization, or unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”
- 60.4 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “it is because the realm of phenomena is without agitation that nonapprehension is attainment, that nonapprehension is clear realization, and that nonapprehension is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Those who wish to attain that which is without apprehending, or to have clear realization of it, or to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment with respect to it, [F.185.a] merely wish to agitate the realm of phenomena.” {Ki.VI: 13}
- 60.5 “Blessed Lord, if in that manner there is no attainment, no clear realization, and no unsurpassed, complete enlightenment with respect to that which is without apprehending, but nonetheless nonapprehension is attainment, nonapprehension is clear realization, and nonapprehension is unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, how then, Blessed Lord, could there possibly be bodhisattva great beings of the first level? How could there possibly be [bodhisattva great beings] of the second level, how could there possibly be [bodhisattva great beings] of the third level, and so on? How could there possibly be [bodhisattva great beings] of the tenth level? How could there possibly be acceptance that phenomena are nonarising? How could there possibly be extrasensory powers that derive from maturation? How could there possibly be generosity that derives from maturation? How could there possibly be ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, or meditative concentration that derive from maturation? How could there possibly be wisdom that derives from maturation? How could there possibly be the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment that derive from maturation? If, abiding in these maturational attributes, they bring beings to maturity, refine the buddhafi elds, and serve the lord buddhas with food, drink, clothing, bedding, palaces, resources, flowers, incense, perfume, garlands, unguents, powders, religious robes, parasols, victory banners, banners, butter lamps, or any other worthy excellences of gods and humans, and do so without interruption until final nirvāṇa is attained, and their [virtuous actions] are not exhausted even after being matured with respect to the sacred relics [of the buddhas] and the śrāvakas, how then, Blessed Lord, [F.185.b] will bodhisattva great beings not agitate the realm of phenomena?"

60.6 The Blessed One replied, "It is because bodhisattva great beings do not agitate the realm of phenomena owing to nonapprehension that there is the first level of bodhisattva great beings, that there is the second level, the third level, and so on, up to and including the tenth level. It is for this reason that there is acceptance that phenomena are nonarising; that there are extrasensory powers that derive from maturation; that there are generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom that derive from maturation; that there are the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment that derive from maturation; and that there are the roots of virtuous action that derive from maturation. It is through these roots of virtuous action that bodhisattva great beings bring beings to maturity, refine the buddhafi elds, and serve the lord buddhas with food, drink, clothing, bedding, palaces, resources, flowers, incense, perfume, garlands, unguents, powders, religious robes, parasols, victory banners, banners, butter lamps, and any other worthy excellences of gods and humans, and do so without interruption until final nirvāṇa is attained, and that these are not exhausted even after being matured with respect to the sacred relics [of the buddhas] and the śrāvakas."

60.7 "Blessed Lord, what is the distinction and what is the difference between nonapprehension on the one hand and generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom, and extrasensory powers on the other?" {Ki.VI: 14} [F.186.a]

60.8 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "there is no difference at all between nonapprehension on the one hand and generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom, and immaculate extrasensory powers on the other. And yet, Subhūti, immaculate generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom, and immaculate extrasensory powers, are revealed to be different.”

60.9 “Blessed Lord, how are immaculate generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom, and extrasensory powers revealed to be different?”

60.10 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they give gifts without apprehending gifts, without apprehending the act of giving, without apprehending the giver, and without apprehending the recipient. They maintain ethical discipline without apprehending ethical discipline. They practice tolerance without apprehending tolerance. They undertake perseverance without apprehending perseverance. They become absorbed without apprehending meditative stability. They cultivate wisdom without apprehending wisdom. They practice extrasensory powers without apprehending extrasensory powers. They practice the applications of mindfulness without apprehending the applications of mindfulness. They practice the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the path without apprehending the path [and so forth]. They practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions without apprehending the formless absorptions [and so forth]. [F.186.b] They practice the aspects of liberation and the serial steps of meditative absorption without apprehending the serial steps of meditative absorption [and so forth]. They practice emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness without apprehending wishlessness [and so forth]. They practice the extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, and kinds of exact knowledge without apprehending the kinds of exact knowledge [and so forth]. They practice great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas without apprehending the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They bring beings to maturity without apprehending beings. They refine the buddhafiels without apprehending the buddhafiels. They attain consummate buddhahood in enlightenment without apprehending the attributes of the buddhas. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom without apprehending anything. Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, it will be difficult for evil Māra or the gods of the domain of Māra to intrude.”⁵¹⁹ {Ki.VII: 15}

60.11 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they acquire the six perfections through a single setting of their minds on enlightenment, and how do they [similarly] acquire the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the four applications of mindfulness, [F.187.a] the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? How do they [similarly] acquire the three gateways of liberation, the four truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, and the five extrasensory powers? How do they [similarly] acquire the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities? How do they [similarly] acquire the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, the thirty-two major marks of a great person, and the eighty minor marks?”

60.12 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “whatever gifts bodhisattva great beings may dispense, these are not acquired by anything other than the perfection of wisdom. Whatever ethical discipline is kept, whatever tolerance is cultivated, whatever perseverance is undertaken, whatever meditative stability is maintained, and whatever wisdom is cultivated, these are not acquired by anything other than the perfection of wisdom. In whichever meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, and formless absorptions one is absorbed; whatever applications of mindfulness are cultivated; whatever correct exertions, supports for miraculous ability, faculties, powers, branches of enlightenment, and noble eightfold path are cultivated; and whatever three gateways of liberation, [F.187.b] truths of the noble ones, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, and extrasensory powers are cultivated, these are not acquired by anything other than the perfection of wisdom. Whatever aspects of emptiness are cultivated—from the emptiness of internal phenomena up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities—and whatever meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are cultivated, these are not acquired by anything other than the perfection of wisdom. Whatever major marks and excellent minor marks are brought into being, these are not acquired by anything other than the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner perfect the six perfections through a single setting of the mind on enlightenment, and [similarly] they perfect the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions. They [similarly] perfect the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They [similarly] perfect the gateways of liberation, the truths of the noble ones, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, and the extrasensory powers. They [similarly] perfect the emptiness of internal phenomena and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers [of the tathāgatas], the fearlessnesses, [F.188.a] the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They [similarly] perfect the major marks of a great person and the excellent minor marks.”

60.13 “Blessed Lord, how, through a single setting of the mind on enlightenment, do bodhisattva great beings who have been embraced by the perfection of wisdom acquire the six perfections? How do they acquire the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, and the formless absorptions? How do they acquire the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? How do they acquire the gateways of liberation, the truths of the noble ones, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, and the extrasensory powers? How do they acquire all the aspects of emptiness? How do they acquire the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, {Ki.VII: 16} the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas? How do they acquire the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the excellent eighty minor marks?”

60.14 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, whatever gifts they dispense, they dispense them having been embraced by the perfection of wisdom, and in this they are without dualistic perception. Whatever ethical discipline they keep, [F.188.b] whatever tolerance they cultivate, whatever perseverance they undertake, whatever meditative stability they are absorbed in, and whatever wisdom they cultivate, they do so having been embraced by the perfection of wisdom, and in this they are without dualistic perception. Whatever aspects of emptiness they cultivate—from the emptiness of internal phenomena up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities—they do so having been embraced by the perfection of wisdom, and in this they are without dualistic perception. Whatever factors conducive to enlightenment they cultivate, they do so having been embraced by the perfection of wisdom, and in this they are without dualistic perception. Whatever truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and distinct qualities of the buddhas they cultivate, they do so having been embraced by the perfection of wisdom, and in this they are without dualistic perception. Whatever major marks and excellent minor marks they actualize, they do so having been embraced by the perfection of wisdom, and in this they are without dualistic perception.”

60.15 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom how do they dispense gifts, and in this be without dualistic perception? How do they cultivate ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative stability, and wisdom, and [F.189.a] in this be without dualistic perception? How do they cultivate the emptiness of internal phenomena [and the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and in this be without dualistic perception? How do they cultivate the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, and in this be without dualistic perception? How do they actualize the thirty-two major marks and the excellent eighty minor marks, and in this be without dualistic perception?”

60.16 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of generosity—that is to say, they complete the perfection of generosity after having integrated all six perfections in that perfection of generosity. They also complete the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom—that is to say, they complete the perfection of wisdom [and so forth] after having integrated all six perfections in that perfection of wisdom [and so forth].

60.17 “When they practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the factors conducive to enlightenment— [F.189.b] that is to say, they complete the factors conducive to enlightenment after having integrated all six perfections in those factors conducive to enlightenment.

60.18 “Subhūti, at the time when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and dispense gifts, they dispense gifts while maintaining a mind that is devoid of contaminants. Indeed, those who maintain a mind that is devoid of contaminants do not observe what is the gift, to whom is it given, by whom is it given, what is the act of giving, or any other mental concept. They dispense gifts with a mind that is free from concepts, without contaminants, devoid of miserliness, and without attachment, and they do not even observe that mind. {Ki.VII: 17} Just as they do not observe that mind, in the same way they do not observe generosity, nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all attributes.

60.19 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and maintain ethical discipline with a mind that is free from concepts, they do not observe that ethical discipline, nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all attributes. [B65]

60.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and cultivate tolerance with a mind that is free from concepts, they do not observe that tolerance, nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all attributes.

60.21 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and undertake perseverance with a mind that is free from concepts, they do not observe that perseverance, [F.190.a] nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all attributes.

60.22 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and are absorbed in meditative stability with a mind that is free from concepts, they do not observe that mental stability, nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all attributes.

60.23 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and cultivate wisdom with a mind that is free from concepts, they do not observe that wisdom, nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all attributes.

60.24 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, and with a mind that is free from concepts actualize the emptiness of internal phenomena [and the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, great compassion, the thirty-two major marks, and the excellent eighty minor marks, [F.190.b] they do not observe those attributes, nor do they observe anything at all, up to and including all those attributes.” {Ki.VII:18}

60.25 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, since all phenomena are without concepts, uneffected, unapprehended, and unconditioned, how do bodhisattva great beings complete the perfection of generosity? How do they complete the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom? How do they complete the emptiness of internal phenomena [and the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, and the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas?”

60.26 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dispense generosity with a mind that is free from concepts concerning all phenomena that are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, and unconditioned. They dispense to those who ask for them [F.191.a] food, drink, clothing, transport, bedding, lodging, houses, riches, grain, precious jewels, gold, gems, pearls, beryl, conch, quartz, coral, pure gold, and silver, up to all other resources suitable for humankind, including wives, sons, daughters, and [necessities] external and internal, ancillary and subsidiary, as well as kingdoms, whichever are appropriate, embellished with ornaments. If someone were to come near and say to them, ‘What is the point of dispensing such gifts of yours, which are useless and ephemeral?’ at that [time] when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom they would think, ‘Although these beings say to me, “What is the point of dispensing such gifts of yours, which are useless and ephemeral,” even so I should dispense gifts; I should not not dispense gifts!’ And then, making common cause with all beings, they would dedicate those gifts to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. When they make this dedication, by all means they do so without considering what is the gift, for whom is the gift, whose is the gift, what is being dispensed, for whom is it being dispensed, who is dispensing, what is being dedicated, to whom is it being dedicated, by whom is it being dedicated,⁵²⁰ or any such concepts. They do not observe any such entity {Ki.VII: 19} that they would dispense, or with respect to which, having been dispensed, they would make a dedication toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because all entities are empty in accordance with the emptiness of internal phenomena, [F.191.b] empty in accordance with the emptiness of external phenomena, empty in accordance with the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and empty in accordance with [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. So when they observe all phenomena to be empty, what would be dedicated, to whom would the dedication be made, and by whom would the dedication be made? Dedications such as this are the best of dedications; they are unpoisoned dedications in accord with the realm of phenomena.

60.27 “Subhūti, when these bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they bring beings to maturity and acquire the buddhafi elds in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned. They complete the perfection of generosity. They complete the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom. They complete all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas.

60.28 “Although they complete the perfection of generosity from the start, they do not accept any ripening [of past actions]— [F.192.a] and yet resources nevertheless materialize for them just by their so wishing. Subhūti, this is just like when all the excellent resources of the gods of the Paranirmitavaśavartin realm arise just by their so wishing. In the same way, Subhūti, all the excellent resources of bodhisattva great beings, too, arise just by their so wishing. Through these resources they venerate the lord buddhas and also satisfy the world with its gods, humans, and asuras. They gather beings with their perfection of generosity, and establish them in the three vehicles with their skillful means. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of generosity in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned.

60.29 “Subhūti, if you ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of ethical discipline, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do complete the perfection of ethical discipline, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned. They acquire the ethical discipline of the noble ones, which is included within the uncontaminated path and acquired on the basis of the true nature. [F.192.b] Their ethical discipline is unimpaired, untainted, unadulterated, unsullied, undiminished, independent, utterly perfect, and praised by the learned. They do not seize on anything at all that may be acquired on the basis of that ethical discipline, including physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, and [the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the thirty-two major marks of a great person {Ki.VII: 20} and the excellent eighty minor marks, as well as the great and lofty royal families, the great and lofty priestly families, and the great and lofty householder families; the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm; the gods of Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, Paranirmita-vaśavartin, Brahmakāyika, Brahmapurohita, Brahmapariṣadya, Mahābrahmā Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parīttāśubha, Apramāṇāśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhat, and the nonperceptual realms; the gods of Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, and Akaniṣṭha; the gods of the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception; and the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and the authority of a universal emperor. In addition, making common cause with all beings, they dedicate this ethical discipline to all-aspect omniscience by means of a signless dedication and an unapprehended and nondual dedication, on the basis of worldly convention rather than ultimate reality. [F.193.a]

60.30 “After completing the perfection of ethical discipline, through skillful means they attain the four meditative concentrations without relishing them. They attain divine clairvoyance. Through the maturation of this divine clairvoyance they see all the lord buddhas, as many as are alive and present, teaching the Dharma in the immeasurable, countless, and inestimable world systems of the eastern direction. Such visions are not squandered until they have themselves attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Through the maturation of this divine clairvoyance they also see all the lord buddhas, as many as are alive and present, teaching the Dharma in the immeasurable, countless, and inestimable world systems of each of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith. Such visions are not squandered until they have themselves attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

60.31 “With pure divine cliraudience, surpassing that of human beings, they hear the words spoken by those lord buddhas. They will not squander that which they have heard until, through that which they have heard,⁵²¹ they have acted for the benefit of themselves and others.

60.32 “With consciousness of the thoughts [of others], their thoughts know the minds of those lord buddhas. They will not squander that consciousness of the thoughts [of others] until they have acted for the benefit of all beings. {Ki.VII: 21}

60.33 “With knowledge of the recollection of past lives, they know the past and future roots of the virtuous action of beings, [F.193.b] and they reveal and elucidate them to those beings, encouraging them and rejoicing in them, so that these beings come to wish in particular for that which has been revealed, [and so forth], up to and including that in which they rejoice.

60.34 “With knowledge that contaminants have ceased, they establish beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and they establish them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and in arhatship. They establish them in individual enlightenment, and they establish them in enlightenment. Similarly, they establish beings in those roots of virtuous action that accord with their capacities.

60.35 “Subhūti, so it is that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of ethical discipline with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, unaffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned.

“Subhūti, if you ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of tolerance with a mind that is devoid of concepts in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom with a mind that is devoid of concepts in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, they cultivate both the tolerance that patiently endures afflictions and the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment. In this regard, the tolerance of bodhisattva great beings [F.194.a] that patiently endures afflictions is such that even though all beings might repeatedly approach them, scolding them, speaking unpleasant words, beating them and hitting them with clods and sticks, and striking them with weapons, those bodhisattva great beings will not allow any opportunity for even a single thought of agitation to arise. They should reflect as follows: ‘There is no one at all who abuses me and speaks unpleasant words, or who binds and beats me. Nor is there anyone who is being scolded, addressed with unpleasant words, beaten, or hit. No such person is apprehended.’ As for the acceptance of bodhisattva great beings that phenomena are nonarising, when bodhisattva great beings reflect on the essential nature of all phenomena, they do not even apprehend reality, so how could they possibly apprehend the inherent nature of phenomena! It is because they do not observe the essential nature of all phenomena that they acquire the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising. If you ask why they are said to be tolerant, they are tolerant because afflictive mental states do not arise and because wisdom is not cut off. These constitute the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising. Abiding in these two aspects of tolerance and acceptance, they complete the four meditative concentrations, and they complete the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, {Ki.VII: 22} the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the three gateways of liberation, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. [F.194.b] Abiding in these attributes of the noble ones, which are uncontaminated, supramundane, and not common to all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, they complete the extrasensory powers of the noble ones.

- 60.37 “Having completed the extrasensory powers, they dwell in the six perfections and in those five extrasensory powers: through divine clairvoyance they see all the lord buddhas, as many as are alive and present, teaching the Dharma in the immeasurable, countless, and inestimable world systems of the eastern direction. Having seen all these lord buddhas, they acquire the recollection of the buddhas, and their recollection of the buddhas will never be interrupted until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Abiding in all these attributes of the noble ones, which are uncontaminated, supramundane, and not common to the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, they complete the extrasensory powers that are the attributes of the noble ones.
- 60.38 “Having completed the extrasensory powers, they dwell in the six perfections and in those five extrasensory powers, and through divine clairvoyance they see all the lord buddhas, as many as are alive and present, teaching the Dharma in the immeasurable, countless, and inestimable world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith. Having seen these lord buddhas, they acquire the recollection of the buddhas, and their recollection of the buddhas will never be interrupted until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.
- 60.39 “Through divine clairauidience, surpassing that of human beings, [F.195.a] they hear the words spoken by those lord buddhas, and having heard them, they retain them, and having retained them, they emphasize the real nature. Having emphasized the real nature, they also then teach the Dharma to beings in accordance with the real nature.
- 60.40 “Through knowledge of the thought patterns [of others], their thoughts know the minds of those lord buddhas, and they also know the mindsets of all noble ones, all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and all beings. Having comprehended with their thoughts the mindsets of all beings, they teach the Dharma in accordance with the real nature.
- 60.41 “Through knowledge of the recollection of past lives, they comprehend the roots of virtuous action of beings, and they also reveal them to those beings, encouraging them, praising them, and rejoicing in them.
- 60.42 “As for knowledge that contaminants have ceased, through knowledge that contaminants have ceased, they establish beings in the three vehicles.
- 60.43 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of tolerance with a mind that is devoid of concepts in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned. These bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom. They bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafiels. Having brought beings to maturity and refined the buddhafiels, they conduct themselves in all-aspect omniscience. Having perfected all-aspect omniscience, [F.195.b] they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Having attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they turn the wheel of the Dharma. Having turned the wheel of the Dharma, they liberate beings from cyclic existence by means of the three vehicles.

60.44 “Subhūti, so it is that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of tolerance in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned. {Ki.VII: 23}

60.45 “Subhūti, if you ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of perseverance with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they possess physical perseverance and they possess mental perseverance, with a mind that is devoid of concepts in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment.

60.46 “Abiding in physical perseverance, they achieve and maintain the first meditative concentration, and then they achieve and maintain the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration. Absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration, they experience many modes of miraculous ability—they can touch the sun and moon with their hands, and [F.196.a] hold sway with their physical body as far as the world realms of Brahmā. They venerate all the lord buddhas, as many as are alive and present in the immeasurable, countless, and inestimable world systems of the ten directions, with robes, alms, bedding, medicines, and many resources, and these robes, alms, bedding, medicines, and many resources will not be depleted until they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Even after attaining consummate buddhahood in enlightenment, they will continue to please the world with its gods, humans, and asuras by means of clothing, alms, bedding, medicines, and many resources. Even after attaining final nirvāṇa, many reliquary offerings will appear before their sacred relics. Through mastery of miraculous abilities, they will listen to the Dharma in the presence of those lord buddhas, and they will never squander that which they have heard until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Conducting themselves in all-aspect omniscience, they also bring beings to maturity and refine the buddhafi elds. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, those who possess physical perseverance complete the perfection of perseverance in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned. [F.196.b]

60.47 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings complete the perfection of perseverance endowed with mental perseverance, comprehending the aspects of the uncontaminated noble path, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they possess mental perseverance with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment. They do not allow any opportunity for nonvirtuous actions of body to arise, they do not allow any opportunity for nonvirtuous actions of speech to arise, and they do not allow any opportunity for nonvirtuous actions of mind to arise.

60.48 “They do not entertain notions⁵²² of anything being ‘permanent’ or ‘impermanent,’ ‘imbued with happiness’ or ‘imbued with suffering,’ ‘self’ or ‘nonself,’ ‘at peace’ or ‘not at peace,’ ‘virtuous’ or ‘nonvirtuous,’ ‘mundane’ or ‘supramundane,’ ‘afflicted’ or ‘unafflicted,’ ‘inadmissible’ or ‘admissible,’ ‘contaminated’ or ‘uncontaminated,’ ‘defiled’ or ‘purified,’ or ‘conditioned’ or ‘unconditioned.’ They do not lay claim to notions of anything being ‘the realm of desire,’ ‘the realm of form,’ ‘the realm of formlessness,’ ‘the contaminated realms,’ ‘the uncontaminated realms,’ [F.197.a] ‘the first meditative concentration,’ ‘the second meditative concentration,’ ‘the third meditative concentration,’ ‘the fourth meditative concentration,’ ‘loving kindness,’ ‘compassion,’ ‘empathetic joy,’ ‘equanimity,’ ‘the sphere of infinite space,’ [Ki.VII: 24] ‘the sphere of infinite consciousness,’ ‘the sphere of nothing-at-all,’ ‘the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception,’ ‘the perfection of generosity,’ ‘the perfection of ethical discipline,’ ‘the perfection of tolerance,’ ‘the perfection of perseverance,’ ‘the perfection of meditative concentration,’ ‘the perfection of wisdom,’ ‘the emptiness of internal phenomena,’ [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including ‘the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities,’ ‘the applications of mindfulness,’ ‘the correct exertions,’ ‘the supports for miraculous ability,’ ‘the faculties,’ ‘the powers,’ ‘the branches of enlightenment,’ ‘the noble eightfold path,’ ‘the truths of the noble ones,’ ‘the meditative concentrations,’ ‘the immeasurable attitudes,’ ‘the formless absorptions,’ ‘the aspects of liberation,’ ‘the serial steps of meditative absorption,’ ‘emptiness,’ ‘signlessness,’ ‘wishlessness,’ ‘the extrasensory powers,’ ‘the meditative

stabilities,' 'the dhāraṇī gateways,' 'the powers of the tathāgatas,' 'the fearlessnesses,' 'the kinds of exact knowledge,' 'great loving kindness,' 'great compassion,' or even the distinct qualities of the buddhas are 'permanent' or 'impermanent,' 'imbued with happiness' or 'imbued with suffering,' 'self' or 'nonself,' 'at peace' or 'not at peace,' 'virtuous' or 'nonvirtuous,' 'mundane' or [F.197.b] 'supramundane,' 'afflicted' or 'unafflicted,' 'inadmissible' or 'admissible,' 'contaminated' or 'uncontaminated,' 'defiled' or 'purified,' or 'conditioned' or 'unconditioned.' They do not lay claim to the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and they do not misconstrue the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, the state of the bodhisattvas, or unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. They do not lay claim to notions of 'one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa,' 'one who is destined for only one more rebirth,' 'one who is no longer subject to rebirth,' or an 'arhat,' 'pratyekabuddha,' 'bodhisattva,' or 'buddha.'

60.49 "Nor indeed do they lay claim to these beings as ranked on the level of insight,⁵²³ these as ranked on the level of attenuated refinement, these as ranked at a lower status, these as ranked at a higher status, these as ranked as having the status of pratyekabuddhas, these as ranked as having knowledge of the path, or these as ranked as having all-aspect omniscience. If you ask why, it is because there is no essential nature⁵²⁴ for ranking them as having any such essential natures. Those endowed with such mental perseverance act for the benefit of beings even though they have actualized [their goal], but they do not at all apprehend those beings. They also complete the perfection of perseverance, but they do not at all apprehend that perfection of perseverance. They also complete the attributes of the buddhas, but they do not at all apprehend the attributes of the buddhas. [F.198.a] They also refine the buddhafiels, but they do not at all apprehend the buddhafiels. Endowed with such mental perseverance, they acquire all virtuous attributes but they are not attached to them. Those without attachment act for the benefit [of others] and proceed from buddhafiels to buddhafiels. They proceed from mundane realm to mundane realm. They conjure emanations by whatever miraculous abilities and miracles they wish to employ. That is to say, they conjure emanations by causing a shower of flowers to fall, by causing the fragrance of incense to waft, by causing thunder to reverberate, by causing the sound of songs and music to resonate, by causing earthquakes, by displaying appearances, or by displaying a world made of the seven precious metals and gems. In whatever circumstances, they also sacrifice their own bodies for the sake of beings. Sometimes they sacrifice themselves for the sake of beings.

Sometimes they discharge delicious fragrance. Sometimes they make great offerings, without the taking of life. {Ki.VII: 25} Sometimes they extricate infinite beings from improper paths. They avert them from killing, and they release them from stealing, sexual misconduct, slander, words of reprimand, lying, nonsensical chatter, covetousness, malice, and wrong views. They benefit some through generosity and they benefit some through ethical discipline. For some they give up their limbs and appendages. For some they renounce their children and wives. For some they renounce a kingdom. For some they sacrifice themselves. Thus they act for the benefit of beings by whatever means they can bring about the benefit of beings. So it is, Subhūti, [F.198.b] that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, those who possess mental perseverance complete the perfection of perseverance, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned.

60.50 “Subhūti, if you ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of meditative concentration in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dwell in the perfection of meditative concentration with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment. With the exception of the meditative stabilities of the tathāgatas, they complete all the [other] meditative stabilities. They achieve and maintain the first meditative concentration, where there is freedom from desires, and freedom from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, while ideation and scrutiny are present, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. They [similarly] achieve and maintain the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration. They achieve and maintain [the immeasurable attitudes], extensively permeating all worlds encompassed by the realm of phenomena and infinite space in all respects with thoughts endowed with loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity. They achieve and maintain the sphere of infinite space, [F.199.a] the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, they are absorbed in the eight aspects of liberation, both consecutively and in reverse order, and then they arise from them. They achieve and maintain the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the meditative stability of emptiness, the meditative stability of signlessness, and the meditative stability of wishlessness. They achieve and maintain the meditative stability without obstacles, and they achieve and maintain the meditative stability that resembles lightning, the authentic meditative stability, and the vajra-like meditative stability. Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, through the wisdom of knowledge of the path, they master all meditative stabilities included within knowledge of the path. {Ki.VII: 26} They transcend the level of bright insight, and they transcend the level of the spiritual family, the eighth-lowest level, the level of insight, the level of attenuated refinement, the level of no attachment, the level of [an arhat's] spiritual achievement, and the level of the pratyekabuddhas. Having transcended the level of the pratyekabuddhas, they enter a bodhisattva's full maturity. Having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they perfect the level of the buddhas. While engaging on these [levels], they do not in the interim acquire the fruits [of the path] until they have attained the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience. Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, they perfect the extrasensory powers. They venerate the lord buddhas and, proceeding from buddhafiield to buddhafiield, they continue to venerate the lord buddhas. [F.199.b] They develop the roots of virtuous action through which, in the presence of those lord buddhas, they refine the buddhafiields and bring beings to maturity. Proceeding from mundane realm to mundane realm, they act on behalf of beings. Some beings they attract by means of generosity. Some they attract by means of ethical discipline. Some they attract by means of meditative stability. Some they attract by means of wisdom. Some they attract by means of liberation. Some they attract by means of the wisdom of liberation.

60.51 "They establish some in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and they establish some in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and in arhatship. They establish some in individual enlightenment, and they establish some in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

60.52 "They engage beings in whichever virtuous attributes will manifestly elevate them. Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, they actualize all the dhāraṇī gateways, they attain the four kinds of exact knowledge, and they also acquire the extrasensory powers that arise from the maturation [of past actions]. They will never again be reborn in a mother's womb owing to past actions and afflicted mental states. They will never again be reliant on desires, but there is no rebirth at all that they will not assume in order to bring beings to maturity. They will be untainted even by the defects of birth. If you ask why, it is because when they discern, are aware, and understand that all phenomena resemble a magical display, they know that all conditioned phenomena resemble a magical display, and they act for the benefit of all beings. [F.200.a] By knowing that all conditioned phenomena are like a magical display, they generate great compassion for beings, with the thought, 'Alas! These beings have experienced much suffering in cyclic existence although all phenomena are like a magical display. At some time or another I will establish all those imbued with suffering in quiescent nirvāṇa!' Since beings, or [even] the concept 'being,' are not apprehended, they do not apprehend anything at all, and then, on the basis of worldly convention rather than ultimate reality, they establish beings in that nonapprehensible state.

60.53 "Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, they practice all the meditative concentrations, liberating meditative stabilities, and absorptions, and they will never be separated from the perfection of meditative stability until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. {Ki.VII: 27} Abiding in this perfection of meditative stability, through knowledge of the path they actualize all-aspect omniscience. Abiding in it, they abandon all reincarnation due to propensities, and then act both for the benefit of themselves and for the benefit of others. Acting for the benefit of themselves and others, they become worthy of the service of the world with its gods, human beings, and asuras. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of meditative stability, with a mind that is devoid of concepts in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned.

60.54 "Subhūti, if you ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the cultivation of the perfection of wisdom [F.200.b] with a mind that is devoid of concepts, in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, in this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not observe anything at all that is true or absolutely existing, with a mind devoid of concepts in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated, and unconditioned, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment. They do not observe the truth or absolute existence of physical forms, and they do not observe the truth or absolute existence of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. Since they do not observe the truth or absolute existence of physical forms and do not observe the truth or absolute existence of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, they do not even observe the arising of physical forms, and they do not even observe the arising of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. Since they do not even observe the arising of physical forms and they do not observe the arising of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, they do not observe the sensory portal for the arising of physical forms, and they do not observe the sensory portal for the arising of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. Since they do not observe the sensory portal for the arising of physical forms, and they do not observe the sensory portal for the arising of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, they do not observe the grouping of physical forms, [F.201.a] and they do not observe the grouping of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. They do not observe them as hollowness or voidness. They do not observe the truth or absolute existence of [any attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. Since they do not observe the arising of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], they do not observe the sensory portal for the arising of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. Since they do not observe the sensory portal for the arising of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], they do not observe the grouping of all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. They do not observe them as hollowness or voidness.

60.55 “When they reflect in that manner, they do not apprehend the inherent existence of physical forms, and they do not apprehend the inherent existence of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not apprehend the inherent existence of [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. When they practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, they realize that all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity. Realizing this, when they engage with the emptiness of internal phenomena, engage with the emptiness of external phenomena, engage with the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and engage with [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, they are not fixated upon anything at all, whether physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, the perfections, the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the noble [F.201.b] truths, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, {Ki.VII: 28} the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, or [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

60.56 “When they practice the perfection of wisdom as the essential nature of nonentity, they complete the path of enlightenment. In this way they complete the six perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They complete the thirty-two major marks and the eighty excellent minor marks of a great person.

60.57 “Those who maintain these attributes through which the path of enlightenment is ripened, after completing the six perfections, [F.202.a] all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, and after completing [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the five extrasensory powers that originate from the maturation [of past actions], then help with generosity those beings who should be helped with generosity. They help with ethical discipline those who should be helped with ethical discipline. They help with tolerance those who should be helped with tolerance. They help with perseverance those who should be helped with perseverance. They help with meditative stability those who should be helped with meditative stability. They help with wisdom those who should be helped with wisdom. They help with liberation those who should be helped with liberation. They help with seeing the wisdom of liberation those who should be helped with seeing the wisdom of liberation. They establish in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa those who should be established in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They establish in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment those who should be established in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment [and so forth].

60.58 “Emanating through many modes of miraculous ability, they travel to world systems as numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā. They materialize at will those world systems numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā from whatever precious gems and metals they wish. [F.202.b] Fulfilling the aspirations of beings, they proceed from world system to world system, and having seen these world systems, they acquire the buddhafi elds that they wish for. However many resources and joys they need—just like the resources and joys in the god realm of Paranirmitavaśavartin, and those of other buddhafi elds, which do not need to be sought—will arise in their buddhafiels. Engaging in knowledge of the path through the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, which derive from the maturation [of past actions], as well as through the extrasensory powers that derive from the maturation [of past actions] and through the path of enlightenment that derives from the maturation [of past actions], they attain the fulfilment of all attributes, and then subsequently they will attain all-aspect omniscience. If they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, commensurate with physical forms not being acquired; commensurate with feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness not being acquired; commensurate with the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination not being acquired; and also commensurate with virtuous, nonvirtuous, mundane, supramundane, contaminated, uncontaminated, conditioned, and unconditioned attributes not being acquired, {Ki.VII: 29} then all the resources and joys in that buddhafielf will be without acquisition. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are without acquisition owing to their being nonapprehensible. [F.203.a] Indeed, they teach the Dharma to beings so that they might not acquire anything.

60.59 “So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfections in that all phenomena are signless, uneffected, unapprehended, unoriginated. and unconditioned. They complete [all causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the distinct qualities of the buddhas.”

60.60 This completes the sixtieth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 61

61.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, since all phenomena are indivisible, signless, and empty of their own defining characteristics, how could the cultivation of the six perfections, namely the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, be fulfilled? How indeed are contaminated and uncontaminated phenomena differentiated? How is the perfection of generosity gathered in the perfection of wisdom? How are the perfection of ethical discipline, [F.203.b] the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, and the perfection of meditative concentration gathered in the perfection of wisdom? How are [all causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the distinct qualities of the buddhas, gathered in the perfection of wisdom? Blessed Lord, how is it conceived that such phenomena do indeed have different defining characteristics when their sole defining characteristic is that they are without defining characteristics?”

61.2 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti, “In this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, cultivate meditative stability, and cultivate wisdom while abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are dreamlike. They dispense generosity, maintain ethical discipline, cultivate tolerance, undertake perseverance, cultivate meditative stability, and cultivate wisdom while abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are like a magical display, like a mirage, like an optical aberration, like an echo, like a reflection, like a gandharva spirit town, and like a phantom. They should reflect that the five aggregates of appropriation, which are dreamlike, are without defining characteristics, and that the five aggregates of appropriation, which are like a magical display, like a mirage, like an optical aberration, like an echo, like a reflection, like a gandharva spirit town, and like a phantom, are without defining characteristics. If you ask why, it is because a dream is without any essential nature, and a magical display, a mirage, an optical aberration, an echo, a reflection, a gandharva spirit town, [F.204.a] and a phantom are without any essential nature. {Ki.VII: 30} Anything that is without essential nature is without defining characteristics. That which is without defining characteristics has the sole defining characteristic that it is without defining characteristics.

61.3 “For this reason, Subhūti, you should know that generosity is without defining characteristics, the dispenser [of generosity] is without defining characteristics, and the recipient is without defining characteristics. Those who dispense generosity [and so forth], while knowing this, fulfill the perfection of generosity. When they fulfill the perfection of generosity they do not turn away from the perfection of ethical discipline. They do not turn away from the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, or the perfection of wisdom. Abiding in these six perfections, they perfect the four meditative concentrations, and they perfect the four immeasurable attitudes and the four formless absorptions. They perfect the four applications of mindfulness, and they perfect the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They perfect the emptiness of internal phenomena and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. They perfect the meditative stability of emptiness, the meditative stability of signlessness, the meditative stability of wishlessness, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the kinds of exact knowledge, [F.204.b] the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.

61.4 “Abiding in these attributes of the noble ones, which arise from the maturation [of past actions] and are indeed supramundane and uncommon, they travel to the immeasurable, countless, and inestimable world systems of the ten directions through their miraculous ability, and approach all the lord buddhas who reside in them, and venerate them with robes, alms, bedding, medicines, and many useful things. They act for the sake of beings through all sorts of resources and joys. They attract through their generosity those beings who are attracted by generosity. They attract through their wisdom [and so forth] those who are attracted by ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom. They attract through all-aspect omniscience [and all the attributes and goals] those who are attracted by [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. They attract through their respective virtuous attributes those who are attracted by the corresponding virtuous attributes. Endowed with those roots of virtuous action and with mastery over all phenomena, they accept [rebirth] in cyclic existence, but are untainted by the sufferings of cyclic existence. For the sake of beings, they accept the excellent resources of gods and humans. They attract beings with those excellent resources. Knowing that all phenomena are without defining characteristics, [F.205.a] they know the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa but do not dwell in it. They know the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, {Ki.VII: 31} the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship, but they do not dwell in them. They know individual enlightenment, but they do not dwell in it. If you ask why, it is because, having known all phenomena, they attain the all-aspect omniscience that is uncommon to the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings, who know all phenomena to be without defining characteristics, know that the six perfections are without defining characteristics. They know that [all the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are without defining characteristics.

61.5 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of ethical discipline, while abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are dreamlike, and abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are like a magical display, like a mirage, like an optical aberration, like an echo, like a reflection, like a gandharva spirit town, and like a phantom. Subhūti, knowing the five aggregates of appropriation to be dreamlike, and knowing the five aggregates of appropriation to be like a magical display, like a mirage, like an optical aberration, like an echo, like a reflection, like a gandharva spirit town, and like a phantom, these bodhisattva great beings also complete the perfection of ethical discipline, which is without defining characteristics, undamaged, unimpaired, faultless, unsullied, nondegenerate, abundant in splendor, praised by the learned, utterly perfect, sublime, uncontaminated, [F.205.b] included in the path, and supramundane.

61.6 “Maintaining these attributes, they maintain the conventional ethical disciplines⁵²⁵ in which precepts are adopted, and they also maintain ethical discipline acquired on the basis of the true nature, ethical discipline conjoined with restraint,⁵²⁶ ethical discipline that is apprehended, ethical discipline that is habitual, and ethical discipline that is not habitual. Endowed with such ethical disciplines, they do not assert the supremacy of anything at all, and so they lay no claims by thinking, ‘Through this ethical discipline, may I be reborn equal in fortune to the great and lofty royal families, or may I be reborn equal in fortune to the great and lofty priestly families, or among the great and lofty householder families!’ They lay no claims by thinking, ‘May I become a minor king or a universal emperor! May I be reborn equal in fortune to the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm! May I be reborn equal in fortune to the gods of the Trayastriṃśa realm, to those of the Yāma realm, or those of the Tuṣita realm, those of the Nirmāṇarata realm, and those of the Paranirmitavaśavartin realm! {Ki.VII: 32} May I attain the fruit of one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa! May I attain the fruit of one destined for only one more rebirth, or the fruit of one no longer subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or [unsurpassed, complete] enlightenment!’

61.7 “If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are without defining characteristics. Since they have a sole defining characteristic—the defining characteristic of the essential nature of nonentity—phenomena that are without defining characteristics cannot acquire phenomena that are without defining characteristics. Nor can phenomena that have dissimilar defining characteristics acquire phenomena that have dissimilar defining characteristics. Nor can phenomena with dissimilar defining characteristics or without defining characteristics acquire phenomena with dissimilar defining characteristics or without defining characteristics. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom will complete the perfection of ethical discipline that is without defining characteristics, [F.206.a] and then embark on the maturity of the bodhisattvas. When they have embarked on the maturity of the bodhisattvas, they will accept that phenomena are nonarising. When they engage in knowledge of the path, they will attain the five extrasensory powers that arise through the maturation [of past actions], and then they will dwell in the five hundred dhāraṇī gateways and the five hundred gateways of meditative stability. Having attained the four kinds of exact knowledge, they will venerate the lord buddhas. Traveling from buddhafiield to buddhafiield, they will bring beings to maturation, and also acquire the buddhafiields. Even if they frequent cyclic existence with its five classes of living beings, they will never be tainted by the ripening of past actions that is associated with cyclic existence. Just as a phantom may stand, move, rest, sit, or even lie down, but no going, coming, resting, sitting, or lying down is apprehended, in the same way they may even act on behalf of beings, but they do not apprehend beings or even the concept of a being. [B66]

61.8 “Subhūti, just as a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha, who is said to be utterly at peace, may attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and then turn the wheel of the Dharma, and even after causing immeasurable beings to attain final nirvāṇa through the two vehicles, may no longer discern any such bodhisattva prophesied to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and let go of the formative predispositions of his [current] lifespan while sending forth an emanation, [F.206.b] and pass into final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa, where there is no residue of the aggregates—and that emanation, Subhūti, would then, after one eon has passed, prophesy bodhisattva great beings to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment and itself pass into final nirvāṇa, {Ki.VII: 33} although no physical form, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, or entity could be apprehended at all with respect to that [emanation] that has attained final nirvāṇa—in the same way, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings do not apprehend beings or the concept of a being, and yet they indeed act on behalf of beings. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of ethical discipline without defining characteristics.

61.9 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of tolerance without defining characteristics, while abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are dreamlike, and abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are like an echo, like an optical aberration, like a magical display, like a mirage, and like a phantom.

61.10 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings complete the perfection of tolerance while maintaining attributes that are without defining characteristics, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings complete the perfection of tolerance through two modes of tolerance. [F.207.a] If you ask what these two are, they comprise the tolerance of the experience [of suffering] and the tolerance that understands phenomena. If you ask what is the tolerance of the experience [of suffering], this implies that, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment until they are seated at the site of enlightenment, even if all beings were to approach those bodhisattva great beings and reprimand them, or rebuke them with unpleasant words and speak mendacious and harsh words, or strike or beat them with clods of earth, clubs, and weapons, seeking to complete the perfection of tolerance, these bodhisattva great beings would not have even the slightest thought imbued with anger or malice. But they should above all cultivate compassion for those beings, thinking, ‘Alas, these beings are tormented by the ailments of afflicted mental states. I should not have negative thoughts toward them. Rather, I should accept them because I have accepted those aggregates that are inimical.’ Imbued with loving kindness and resorting to compassion, such reflections are called the tolerance of the experience [of suffering].

- 61.11 “If you ask what is the tolerance that understands phenomena, since even those beings are ultimately nonapprehensible, [bodhisattvas] should think, ‘Who is scolding me, reprimanding me with unpleasant words, or speaking mendacious and harsh words? Who is beating me with clods and clubs, or striking me with weapons? All formative predispositions are illusion-like. They are hollow, void, vacuous, and like space. They are without self, any sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, or persons. Since all these conceptual thoughts derive from imagination, who is scolding me, reprimanding me with unpleasant words, or speaking mendacious and harsh words? Who is beating me with clods and clubs, or striking me with weapons? [F.207.b] Owing to the emptiness of essential nature and owing to the emptiness of ultimate reality, I should not conceptualize in these ways.’ This is called the tolerance that understands phenomena. Reflecting in that manner, they perfect the perfection of tolerance. Those who have perfected the perfection of tolerance attain the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising.”
- 61.12 Then Subhūti asked, “Blessed Lord, what is the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising? What is its extent? What is its cognition?”
- 61.13 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “not even the slightest phenomena arise—this denotes nonarising. Acceptance is said to be that through which it is cognized. Through this cognition, they acquire the acceptance that phenomena are nonarising.” {Ki.VII:34}
- 61.14 “Blessed Lord, what are the distinctions between the acceptance that śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas have with respect to [the truth] that phenomena are nonarising, and the acceptance that bodhisattvas have with respect to [the truth] that phenomena are nonarising?”
- 61.15 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the acceptance of bodhisattva great beings includes the cognition and correct exertion of those who enter the stream to nirvāṇa. The acceptance of bodhisattva great beings includes the cognition and correct exertion of those who are destined for only one more rebirth. The acceptance of bodhisattva great beings includes the cognition and correct exertion of those who are no longer subject to rebirth. The acceptance of the bodhisattva great beings includes the cognition and correct exertion of those who are arhats. The acceptance of bodhisattva great beings includes the cognition and correct exertion of those who are pratyekabuddhas. [F.208.a] This then is the distinction between the acceptance of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and the acceptance of the bodhisattvas.
- 61.16 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who possess such acceptance surpass all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas. Abiding in this acceptance that phenomena are nonarising, which derives from the maturation [of past actions], they practice the path of the bodhisattvas, and perfect the knowledge of the path. By perfecting this, they will not lack the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, or the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They will not lack the five extrasensory powers, and since they will not lack the five extrasensory powers, they will bring beings to maturation, and refine the buddhafi elds. Having brought beings to maturation and refined the buddhafi elds, they will attain all-aspect omniscience through the wisdom of a single instant. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they will perfect the perfection of tolerance, which is without defining characteristics.

61.17 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they exert physical and mental perseverance, while abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are dreamlike, and abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are like an echo, like an optical aberration, like a magical display, like a mirage, and like a phantom. Through physical perseverance, they actualize miraculous abilities; {Ki.VII: 35} [F.208.b] traversing the world systems of all the cardinal and intermediate directions, they act for the sake of beings and refine the buddhafi elds. Through physical perseverance, they will bring beings to maturation, encourage them to engage in the three vehicles, and establish them in those vehicles. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they will perfect the perfection of tolerance, which is without defining characteristics.

61.18 “One who possesses mental perseverance, which is included within the path and the branches of the path free from contaminants, will perfect the integration of all the following virtuous attributes: the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the three gateways to liberation, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Practicing in that manner, bodhisattva great beings will perfect all-aspect omniscience, and by perfecting that, they will abandon all the connecting propensities. Having abandoned all the connecting propensities, they will perfect the excellent major marks, [F.209.a] and after acquiring an aureole, they will turn the wheel of the Dharma, in the three times and in its twelve aspects. Through this turning [of the wheel], the world systems of the great trichiliocosm will shake, shudder, and judder in six ways;⁵²⁷ they will rock, reel, and totter, and they will quiver, careen, and convulse.

61.19 “All world systems of the great trichiliocosm will also be permeated with great luminosity. The words of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, wherever they arise and their intonation resonates, will be heard by all those beings who are present in the world systems of the great trichiliocosm. All of them will attain emancipation through the three vehicles. Subhūti, this perfection of perseverance that bodhisattva great beings have is endowed with such great benefits. Abiding in the perfection of perseverance, bodhisattva great beings will perfect all the attributes of the buddhas and attain all-aspect omniscience.

61.20 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they complete the perfection of meditative stability,⁵²⁸ while abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are dreamlike, and abiding in the five aggregates of appropriation that are like an echo, like an optical aberration, like a magical display, like a mirage, {Ki.VII: 36} and like a phantom. If you ask why, in this regard, Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom will achieve and maintain the first meditative concentration, and then they will achieve and maintain the second meditative concentration, [F.209.b] the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration. They will also achieve and maintain loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity, and they will achieve and maintain [the formless absorptions in] the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. They will cultivate the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness. They will cultivate the meditative stability that resembles lightning. They will cultivate the authentic meditative stability. With the exception of dwelling in the vajra-like meditative stability and [attaining] the meditative stabilities of the tathāgatas, they will also achieve and maintain all the meditative stabilities of the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, and any other categories of meditative stability and meditative absorption, their bodies permeated with them all. But they will not relish these meditative stabilities or the fruits of these meditative absorptions. If you ask why, it is because bodhisattva great beings understand that these meditative stabilities are without defining characteristics and have an essential nature of nonentity. So how could anything without defining characteristics possibly relish an attribute that is without defining characteristics! How could anything that is a nonentity possibly relish something that is a nonentity! Since they do not relish anything, they will not be reborn through the power of these meditative stabilities in the realm of form or in the realm of formlessness. If you ask why, it is because they do not even apprehend those two realms, nor do they apprehend anyone entering into absorption, nor anything by which they would enter into absorption. Since all phenomena are nonapprehensible, they will complete the perfection of meditative stability that is without defining characteristics. [F.210.a] Through this perfection of meditative stability, they will transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas.”

61.21 “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings complete the perfection of meditative stability and transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas?”

61.22 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings have been well trained in the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they have been well trained in the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of external and internal phenomena, and in [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. So, with respect to these aspects of emptiness, they do not apprehend anything at all that would attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, or the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, or the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship, or individual enlightenment, or anything in which they should dwell. All-aspect omniscience, too, is empty of these aspects of emptiness. Through these aspects of emptiness, they will absolutely transcend the levels of the śrāvakas and the pratyekabuddhas, [Ki.VII: 37] and enter a bodhisattva’s full maturity.”

61.23 “Blessed Lord, what is the immaturity of bodhisattva great beings, and what is the maturity of the bodhisattvas?”

“Subhūti, all apprehending constitutes the immaturity of bodhisattva great beings. All nonapprehension constitutes their maturity,” replied the Blessed One.

61.24 “Blessed Lord, what is apprehending? What is the nonapprehension?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “physical forms [F.210.b] constitute apprehending for bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness constitute apprehending for bodhisattva great beings. The eyes and sights constitute apprehending for bodhisattva great beings. The ears and sounds, the nose and odors, the tongue and tastes, the body and tangibles, and the mental faculty and mental phenomena constitute apprehending for bodhisattva great beings. Visual consciousness, visually compounded sensory contact, and feelings conditioned by visually compounded sensory contact constitute apprehending. Auditory consciousness, olfactory consciousness, gustatory consciousness, tactile consciousness, mental consciousness, mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], and feelings conditioned by mentally compounded sensory contact [and so forth], all constitute apprehending. The earth element, the water element, the fire element, the wind element, the space element, and the consciousness element constitute apprehending. Fundamental ignorance, formative predispositions, consciousness, name and form, the six sense fields, sensory contact, sensation, craving, grasping, the rebirth process, actual birth, and aging and death constitute apprehending. All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, all the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, [F.211.a] great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas all constitute apprehending. [All the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, constitute apprehending. These are indicative of the immaturity [of bodhisattva great beings].

61.25 “Subhūti, the maturity [of bodhisattva great beings] is that in which even the expressions of these attributes are nonapprehensible—from physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, the sense fields, the sensory elements, the links of dependent origination, all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, all the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, [and to all the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

61.26 “If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because physical forms are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. {Ki.VII: 38} All the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and all the factors conducive to enlightenment are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. The noble [F.211.b] truths, the meditative concentrations, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. [All the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are without inherent existence, and whatever is without inherent existence is indescribable. These, Subhūti, are indicative of the maturity of bodhisattva great beings.

61.27 “If bodhisattva great beings perfect all the meditative stabilities and meditative absorptions that enter into this maturity, and indeed will not be reborn on account of these meditative stabilities and meditative absorptions, how could they possibly be reborn through desire, hatred, or delusion, let alone lapse into cyclic existence with its five types of living beings due to the conditioning of past actions, while maintaining [those stabilities and absorptions]? On the contrary, they dwell in attributes that are like a magical display, and act for the benefit of all beings, but they do not apprehend either beings or their magical display. Since they do not apprehend beings or their magical display, they indeed bring beings to maturation and acquire the buddhafi elds. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, [F.212.a] they complete the perfection of meditative stability, and from then, as long as they turn the wheel of the Dharma, they turn the wheel of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, which is without apprehending.

61.28 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they comprehend all phenomena in the manner of a dream, and they comprehend all phenomena in the manner of an echo, in the manner of an optical aberration, in the manner of a magical display, in the manner of a mirage, and in the manner of a phantom.”

61.29 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they definitively comprehend that all phenomena are like a dream. How do they definitively comprehend that all phenomena are like an echo, like an optical aberration, like a magical display, like a mirage, and like a phantom?”

61.30 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not see dreams and they do not see viewers of dreams. They do not hear echoes and they do not see hearers of echoes. They do not see optical aberrations and they do not see viewers of optical aberrations. They do not see magical displays and they do not see viewers of magical displays. {Ki.VII: 39} They do not see mirages and they do not see viewers of mirages. They do not see phantoms and they do not see viewers of phantoms. If you ask why, it is because dreams are the erroneous misconceptions of ordinary simple people. Echoes are their erroneous misconceptions. Optical aberrations are their erroneous misconceptions. Magical displays are their erroneous misconceptions. Mirages are their erroneous misconceptions, and phantoms are their erroneous misconceptions. Arhats do not see dreams and they do not see viewers of dreams. [F.212.b] They do not hear echoes and they do not see hearers of echoes. They do not see optical aberrations and they do not see viewers of optical aberrations. They do not see magical displays and they do not see viewers of magical displays. They do not see mirages and they do not see viewers of mirages. They do not see phantoms and they do not see viewers of phantoms. [Others], up to and including pratyekabuddhas, as well as bodhisattvas and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, do not see dreams and they do not see viewers of dreams. They do not hear echoes and they do not see hearers of echoes. They do not see optical aberrations and they do not see viewers of optical aberrations. They do not see magical displays and they do not see viewers of magical displays. They do not see mirages and they do not see viewers of mirages. They do not see phantoms and they do not see viewers of phantoms. If you ask why, all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity because they are not genuinely true, equivalent to final nirvāṇa. All phenomena are without absolute existence because they are absolutely untrue. In that case, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how could they possibly acquire the notion of an entity, or the notion of absolute existence, or the notion of something that is true? That would be impossible!

61.31 “If you ask why, it would not be the perfection of wisdom if one were to apprehend the essential nature, absolute existence, or authenticity of anything. When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in this manner, they are not attached to physical forms, and they are not attached to feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They are not attached to the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. [F.213.a] They are not attached to the realm of desire, and they are not attached to the realm of form or the realm of formlessness. They are not attached to the perfection of generosity, and they are not attached to the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, or the perfection of wisdom. They are not attached to the emptiness of internal phenomena, and they are not attached to [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity. They are not attached to the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They are not attached to the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers. They are not attached to the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways. They are not attached to the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. They are not attached to [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

61.32 “Abiding in this perfection of wisdom, they perfect the first [bodhisattva] level, without any longing for it arising. If you ask why, since they do not even apprehend that level, how could longing for it possibly arise! Abiding in this perfection of wisdom, they perfect the second level, the third level, the fourth level, the fifth level, {Ki.VII: 40} the sixth level, the seventh level, the eighth level, the ninth level, and [F.213.b] the tenth level, without any longing for them arising. If you ask why, since they do not even apprehend those levels, how could longing for them possibly arise! While practicing the perfection of wisdom, they do not even apprehend this perfection of wisdom. When they practice the perfection of wisdom that is without apprehending, they perceive that all phenomena are indeed gathered within this perfection of wisdom, but they do not at all apprehend these phenomena. If you ask why, it is because these phenomena and the perfection of wisdom are nondual and indivisible. If you ask why, it is because these phenomena are not to be at all differentiated. Indeed, all phenomena are indivisible because they denote the realm of phenomena, they denote the real nature, and they denote the very limit of reality.”

61.33 “Blessed Lord, since all phenomena are indivisible, how are phenomena revealed to be virtuous or nonvirtuous? How are phenomena revealed to be mundane or supramundane? How are phenomena revealed to be contaminated or uncontaminated? How are phenomena revealed to be conditioned or unconditioned?”

61.34 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “do you think that with regard to the reality of all phenomena there exists the description of anything—conditioned or unconditioned, or similarly, pertaining to the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, or the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, or the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship, individual enlightenment, or even the bodhisattvas?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

61.35 “For that reason, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, [F.214.a] “you should know that all phenomena are indivisible, all phenomena are without defining characteristics, they are nonarising, and they are unoriginated. Subhūti, formerly, when I engaged in the conduct of a bodhisattva, I did not apprehend the inherent existence of anything at all—‘physical forms,’ ‘feelings,’ ‘perceptions,’ ‘formative predispositions,’ ‘consciousness,’ ‘sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination,’ ‘all the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment,’ ‘[all the fruitional attributes], up to and including the distinct qualities of the buddhas,’ ‘virtuous and nonvirtuous attributes,’ ‘afflicted, unafflicted, mundane, supramundane, contaminated, uncontaminated, common, uncommon, conditioned, and unconditioned attributes,’ or ‘the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa,’ ‘the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship,’ or ‘individual enlightenment,’ or ‘[the other goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’ So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, starting from the time when they first begin to set their mind [on enlightenment], until they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, that they should be skillful with regard to the essential nature of all phenomena, without apprehending anything. {Ki.VII: 41} Skillful with regard to the essential nature of all phenomena, bodhisattva great beings perfect the path of enlightenment, and bring beings to maturation and [F.214.b] acquire the buddhafi elds. Abiding in them, they attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and then in various ways they also instruct beings so that they are disciplined, and no longer appear within the three levels of existence. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should train in this perfection of wisdom in a manner that is signless.”⁵²⁹

61.36 This completes the sixty-first chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.” {Ki.VIII: 43}

CHAPTER 62: TEACHING THE MANIFESTATION OF THE MAJOR AND MINOR MARKS AND THE PERFECTION OF WISDOM

- 62.1 {Ki.VIII: 44} Thereupon, the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, since all phenomena are dreamlike nonentities, with the essential nature of nonentity and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, how then can it be established that these are virtuous phenomena, these are nonvirtuous phenomena, these are mundane phenomena, these are supramundane phenomena, these are contaminated phenomena, these are uncontaminated phenomena, these are conditioned phenomena, these are unconditioned phenomena, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth or the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth and arhatship, these will be conducive to individual enlightenment, and these will be conducive to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Since all phenomena that resemble an echo, phenomena that resemble an optical aberration, and that resemble a magical display, a mirage, and a phantom are nonentities with the essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics, how can it be established that these are virtuous phenomena, these are nonvirtuous phenomena, [F.215.a] these are mundane phenomena, these are supramundane phenomena, these are contaminated phenomena, these are uncontaminated phenomena, these are conditioned phenomena, these are unconditioned phenomena, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth or the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth and arhatship, these will be conducive to individual enlightenment, and these will be conducive to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”⁵³⁰

62.2 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “common, simple people who have not studied [this discourse] apprehend dreams and they also apprehend viewers of dreams. They apprehend echoes and they also apprehend hearers of echoes. They apprehend optical aberrations and they also apprehend viewers of optical aberrations. They apprehend magical displays and they also apprehend viewers of magical displays. They apprehend mirages and they also apprehend viewers of mirages. They apprehend phantoms and they also apprehend viewers of phantoms. {Ki.VIII: 45} Then, on that basis, they actualize virtuous formative predispositions through body, speech, and mind. They also actualize nonvirtuous formative predispositions through body, speech, and mind. They also actualize formative predispositions of the meritorious, nonmeritorious, and neutral sorts through body, speech, and mind.

62.3 “On the other hand, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom teach the Dharma to beings, [F.215.b] while abiding in the twofold emptiness—that is to say the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end—[and they say], ‘These three realms are empty. In them there are no physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, sense fields, or sensory elements. They are a dream, they are an echo, they are an optical aberration, they are a magical display, they are a mirage, and they are a phantom. In them there are no aggregates, sense fields, or sensory elements. In them there is no dream or viewer of dreams. There is no echo or hearer of echoes. There is no optical aberration or viewer of optical aberrations. There is no magical display or creator of magical displays. There is no mirage or viewer of mirages. There is no phantom or viewer of phantoms. All these phenomena are nonentities and of the essential nature of nonentity, but you perceive aggregates when there are no aggregates! You perceive sense fields when there are no sense fields! You perceive sensory elements when there are no sensory elements! Since all these phenomena arise erroneously from dependent origination, and have been grasped through the maturation of past actions, why else would you perceive the nonentity of all phenomena as entities?’

62.4 “When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, with skill in means, they turn miserly beings away from miserliness, and commit them to the perfection of generosity. The dispensing of generosity on the part of those [beings] is conducive to great resources. But turning them away from that [indulgence], [the bodhisattvas] then commit them to ethical discipline. The adopting of ethical discipline on the part of those [beings] is conducive to rebirth in the exalted realms. But turning them away from that [indulgence], [the bodhisattvas] then commit them to meditative stability. The meditative stability on the part of those [beings] is conducive to rebirth in the worlds of Brahmā. [F.216.a] But turning them away from [that indulgence, the bodhisattvas] commit them to the first meditative concentration, and from the first meditative concentration, they commit them to the second meditative concentration. They turn them away from the second meditative concentration and commit them to the third meditative concentration. They turn them away from the third meditative concentration and commit them to the fourth meditative concentration. They turn them away from the fourth meditative concentration and commit them to the [formless] absorption of the sphere of infinite space. They turn them away from the [formless] absorption of the sphere of infinite space, and commit them to the [formless] absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness. They turn them away from the [formless] absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness, and commit them to the [formless] absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all. They turn them away from the [formless] absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all, and commit them to the [formless] absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception.

62.5 “Thereupon, through many ways they turn some beings away from generosity and the fruit of generosity, {Ki.VIII: 46} and inspire them, induce them, and establish them in the expanse of nirvāṇa, where there is no residue of the aggregates. Through many ways they turn them away from ethical discipline and the fruit of ethical discipline, and induce them toward the expanse of nirvāṇa, where there is no residue of the aggregates. Through many ways, they turn them away from meditative stability and the fruit of meditative stability, and induce them toward the expanse of nirvāṇa, where there is no residue of the aggregates. Through many ways, they also turn some beings away from the meditative stabilities, the [formless] absorptions, the fruit of the meditative stabilities, and the fruit of the [formless] absorptions, and, reversing their resolve, induce them to enter and become established in the expanse of nirvāṇa, where there is no residue of the aggregates.

62.6 “They then reveal, encourage, praise, and rejoice in [the causal and fruitional attributes], training and inducing [beings] and establishing them in the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the three gateways of liberation, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways,

[F.216.b] the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas.

62.7 “Through these [attributes], which are without contaminants, immaterial, unrevealed, and unimpeded, they establish in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa those who strive toward the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They establish in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth those who strive toward the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth. They establish in the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth those who strive toward the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth. They establish in arhatship those who strive toward arhatship. They establish in individual enlightenment those who strive toward individual enlightenment. They describe and reveal the path of [unsurpassed] enlightenment to those who strive toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, encouraging, praising, and rejoicing in them, while training, inducing, and establishing them in it. So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they establish that all phenomena are dreamlike, like an echo, like an optical aberration, like a magical display, like a mirage, like a phantom, nonentities with an essential nature of nonentity, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics.”

62.8 The venerable Subhūti then said to the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how wonderful and marvelous it is that when bodhisattva great beings practice this profound perfection of wisdom, they should establish that all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, that all phenomena are endowed with the emptiness of the unlimited [F.217.a] and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end, and yet [distinguish that] these are virtuous phenomena, these are nonvirtuous phenomena, these are mundane phenomena, these are supramundane phenomena, these are inadmissible phenomena, these are admissible phenomena, these are contaminated phenomena, these are uncontaminated phenomena, these are conditioned phenomena, these are unconditioned phenomena, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth or the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth and the fruit of arhatship, these will be conducive to individual enlightenment, and these will be conducive to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!”

62.9 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti, “Subhūti, it is so! It is so. It is wonderful and marvelous that when bodhisattva great beings practice this profound perfection of wisdom accordingly, they may establish that all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, that all phenomena are endowed with the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end, and yet [distinguish that] these are virtuous phenomena, these are nonvirtuous phenomena, these are mundane phenomena, these are supramundane phenomena, these are inadmissible phenomena, these are admissible phenomena, these are contaminated phenomena, these are uncontaminated phenomena, these are conditioned phenomena, these are unconditioned phenomena, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, these will be conducive to actualizing the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth or the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth and [F.217.b] the fruit of arhatship, these will be conducive to individual enlightenment, and that these will be conducive to unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

62.10 “If, Subhūti, you understand these wondrous and marvelous attributes of bodhisattva great beings, {Ki.VIII: 47} [you will appreciate that] it is not easy for all the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas to repay the favors of those bodhisattva great beings. Indeed, there is no one among you who can surpass these attributes of bodhisattva great beings.”

62.11 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, what are the wonderful and marvelous attributes of bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom, which are unknown to all śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas?”

62.12 “For that, Subhūti, you should listen carefully and pay attention!” replied the Blessed One. “I will explain. In this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they are established in the six perfections, which arise through the maturation [of past actions]. They are established in all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They may traverse the world systems of the cardinal and intermediate directions, [F.218.a] and they benefit through their generosity those beings who are to be benefited through generosity. They benefit with their ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom those beings who are to be benefited through wisdom [and so forth]. They benefit with the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration those beings who are to be benefited through the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. They benefit with the absorption in the sphere of infinite space, the absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, the absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception those beings who are to be benefited through the absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception [and so forth]. They benefit through loving kindness those beings who are to be benefited through loving kindness. They benefit through compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity those beings who are to be benefited through equanimity [and so forth]. They benefit through the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, [F.218.b] the four kinds of exact knowledge, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and great compassion those who are to be benefited through great compassion [and so forth]. They benefit through [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, those beings who are to be benefited through all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].”

62.13 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they benefit beings through generosity?”

62.14 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dispense food to those who need food, drink to those who need drink, transport to those who need transport, garlands to those who need garlands, perfume to those who need perfume, unguents to those who need unguents, clothing to those who need clothing, bedding to those who need bedding, dwellings to those who need dwellings, and so on, up to and including whichever resources are appropriate. {Ki.VIII: 48} Just as they make offerings and donations to the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas, and just as they make donations to pratyekabuddhas, arhats, those no longer subject to rebirth, those destined for only one more rebirth, those who have entered the stream to nirvāṇa, those who have progressed in an authentic direction, and those who have set out in an authentic direction, in the same way they also dispense their generosity to all beings, including those who are human beings and those who have been born as animals, based on the notion that phenomena are undifferentiated. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena [F.219.a] are undifferentiated. By dispensing undifferentiated generosity, they attain that which is undifferentiated, all-aspect omniscience.

- 62.15 “Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings were to perceive living creatures included within the animal realm as not worthy recipients of their generosity, and were to think, ‘The worthy recipient of my generosity is the completely awakened buddha, but not those included in the animal realm,’ then they would lack the attributes of a bodhisattva. If you ask why, it is because bodhisattva great beings who have set their minds on enlightenment and then reflected that they should benefit some beings through their generosity, but not benefit others through their generosity, have not entered authentically upon unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. After benefiting them all through generosity, they will be reborn within great and lofty royal families. They will be reborn within great and lofty priestly families. They will be reborn within great and lofty householder families. Then those who have benefited from this same generosity will gradually, by means of the three vehicles, attain final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa, where there is no residue of the aggregates.
- 62.16 “If all the mass of living creatures were to resolve to kill bodhisattva great beings, those bodhisattva great beings should not set their minds on another course, wondering whether to give to them or not to give to them, but instead should dispense generosity to those masses of living creatures with an undisturbed mind. If you ask why, it is because [F.219.b] they have authentically set out toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of all beings. If they were to discriminate, the lord buddhas, the bodhisattva great beings, the pratyekabuddhas, arhats, and disciples, as well as the world with its gods, humans, and asuras, who have requested them from the start to be a lord-protector of all beings, or to be their sanctuary, refuge, or ally, would then reproach them.
- 62.17 “Moreover, Subhūti, if human or nonhuman beings were to approach bodhisattva great beings, asking to sever their limbs and appendages, saying, ‘I am your suppliant,’ at that time they should not be of two minds, wondering whether they should give them or not give them. If you ask why, because these bodhisattva great beings have assumed their physical body for the sake of beings with the aspiration that they should act for the benefit of all beings through their physical body, they should set their minds on the thought, ‘Since I have assumed this physical body for the sake of these beings, may they carry it off and depart without having to ask for it!’ Subhūti, it is in this manner {Ki.VIII: 49} that bodhisattva great beings should train in the perfection of wisdom.
- 62.18 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings see a beggar, [F.220.a] they should think, ‘Since the inherent existence of anything cannot be apprehended, who is it that dispenses generosity, to whom should generosity be dispensed, and what should be dispensed?’ If you ask why, it is because these phenomena are empty, owing to the emptiness of the unlimited. In emptiness there is nothing to which [generosity] is dispensed nor is there anything from which it is taken away. It is thus, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should train in the perfection of wisdom, that is to say, in the emptiness of internal phenomena and in [all the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. When they dispense generosity, abiding in emptiness, they will always perfect their perfection of generosity, without interruption. Those who have perfected their perfection of generosity will not think there is anyone cutting or severing them, even though their outer and inner attributes may be severed or cut.

62.19 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see that there are bodhisattva great beings who have deliberately journeyed to the great hells and after alleviating the sufferings of the great hells, teach the Dharma to those denizens of the hells by means of three sorts of miracles—miraculous magical abilities, miraculous revealing, and miraculous instructing. Through miraculous magical abilities, they have alleviated the sufferings of the great hells and then through miraculous revealing and miraculous instructing they teach the Dharma. [F.220.b] Indeed, these bodhisattva great beings teach the Dharma through loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity. Consequently, beings of the hells believe in those bodhisattva great beings, they become elevated from those great hells, they arise from those great hells and are born as gods and as human beings in accord with their fortune, and gradually they put an end to suffering by means of the three vehicles.

62.20 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see that there are bodhisattva great beings who have deliberately journeyed to the great hells and after alleviating the sufferings of the great hells, teach the Dharma to those denizens of the hells by means of three sorts of miracles—miraculous magical abilities, miraculous revealing, and miraculous instructing. {Ki.VIII: 50} Through miraculous magical abilities they have alleviated the sufferings of the great hells and then through miraculous revealing and miraculous instructing they teach the Dharma. Indeed, these bodhisattva great beings teach the Dharma through loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity. Consequently, beings of the hells believe in those bodhisattva great beings, they become elevated from those great hells, [F.221.a] they arise from those great hells and are born as gods and as human beings in accord with their fortune, and gradually they put an end to suffering by means of the three vehicles.

62.21 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see that there are bodhisattva great beings who are venerating the lord buddhas. Those bodhisattva great beings venerate the lord buddhas in such a way that they only please them and never fail to please them, are only accepted by them and never fail to be accepted by them, and only respect them and never fail to respect them. Those bodhisattva great beings maintain the Dharma taught by those lord buddhas, and having maintained it, they retain it and never squander it until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

62.22 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see that there are bodhisattva great beings who are venerating the lord buddhas. Those bodhisattva great beings venerate the lord buddhas in such a way that they only please them and never fail to please them, are only accepted by them and never fail to be accepted by them, and only respect them and never fail to respect them. [F.221.b] Those bodhisattva great beings maintain the Dharma taught by those lord buddhas, and having maintained it, they retain it and never squander it until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. [B67]

62.23 “Also, Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see those bodhisattva great beings sacrificing themselves for the sake of beings in the animal realm; the limbs and appendages of these bodhisattva great beings being severed, cut, and scattered in the ten directions; and beings, including those of the animal realm, feeding upon the flesh of those bodhisattva great beings. Consequently, they acquire loving kindness for those bodhisattva great beings, and having acquired loving kindness they become elevated from the animal realm, arise therefrom, and are born among the gods and human beings. Having been born in these realms, they also please the lord buddhas, venerate the lord buddhas, and listen to the Dharma from the lord buddhas. Emphasizing the real nature, by means of the three vehicles—the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the great vehicle—they gradually attain final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where there is no residue of the aggregates. [F.222.a] It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and emphasize the real nature, achieve many acts of benefit.

62.24 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see those bodhisattva great beings sacrificing themselves for the sake of beings in the animal realm; the limbs and appendages of these bodhisattva great beings being severed, cut, and scattered in the ten directions; and beings, including those of the animal realm, feeding upon the flesh of those bodhisattva great beings. Consequently, they acquire loving kindness for those bodhisattva great beings, and having acquired loving kindness they become elevated from the animal realm, arise therefrom, and are born among the gods and human beings. Having been born in these realms, they also please the lord buddhas, {Ki.VIII: 51} venerate the lord buddhas, and listen to the Dharma from the lord buddhas. Emphasizing the real nature, by means of the three vehicles—the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, and the great vehicle—they gradually attain final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where there is no residue of the aggregates. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who set their minds on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.222.b] and emphasize the real nature, achieve many acts of benefit.

62.25 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see those bodhisattva great beings allaying all the many sufferings endured by the denizens of the realm of anguished spirits in the realms of the anguished spirits, and teaching the Dharma so that they might abandon miserliness. There those denizens of the realm of anguished spirits set their minds on loving kindness toward those bodhisattva great beings, and they are elevated from those realms of the anguished spirits. Arising from those realms of the anguished spirits, they are born through those very roots of virtuous action in the world of the gods and in the world of human beings. Until they attain final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where there is no residue of the aggregates, they will never be separated from the lord buddhas.

62.26 “Also, Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see those bodhisattva great beings allaying all the many sufferings endured by the denizens of the realm of anguished spirits in the realms of the anguished spirits, and teaching the Dharma so that they might abandon miserliness. There those denizens of the realm of anguished spirits set their minds on loving kindness toward those bodhisattva great beings, and they are elevated from those realms of the anguished spirits. Arising from those realms of the anguished spirits, they are born through those very roots of virtuous action [F.223.a] in the world of the gods and in the world of human beings. Until they attain final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where there is no residue of the aggregates, they will never be separated from the lord buddhas.

62.27 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see bodhisattva great beings teaching the Dharma to the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm and teaching the Dharma to the gods of the Trayastriṃśa realm, the Yāma realm, the Tuṣita realm, the Nirmāṇarata realm, and the Paranirmitavaśavartin realm. These gods listen to the Dharma from those bodhisattva great beings and gradually they have attained, are attaining, and will attain final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles. {Ki.VIII:52}

62.28 “In this regard, Subhūti, they know that those gods who are mostly intoxicated by the five attributes of the senses become depressed when they perceive their celestial palaces ablaze, and teach them the Dharma, saying, ‘Friends, if all that is conditioned is impermanent, all that is conditioned is suffering, all that is conditioned is without self, all that is conditioned is unstable, all that is conditioned is unreliable, and all that is conditioned is changeable, who could possibly place their trust in all phenomena that are conditioned!’

62.29 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, [F.223.b] I see bodhisattva great beings teaching the Dharma to the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm and teaching the Dharma to the gods of the Trayastriṃśa realm, the Yāma realm, the Tuṣita realm, the Nirmāṇarata realm, and the Paranirmitavaśavartin realm. These gods listen to the Dharma from those bodhisattva great beings and gradually they have attained, are attaining, and will attain final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles.

62.30 “In this regard, Subhūti, they know that those gods who are mostly intoxicated by the five attributes of the senses become depressed when they perceive their celestial palaces ablaze, and teach them the Dharma, saying, ‘Friends, if all that is conditioned is impermanent, all that is conditioned is suffering, all that is conditioned is without self, all that is conditioned is unstable, all that is conditioned is unreliable, and all that is conditioned is changeable, who could possibly place their trust in all phenomena that are conditioned!’

62.31 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see bodhisattva great beings teaching the Dharma to beings who are fixated on the view of Brahmā and separating them from those views with the words, ‘Friends, when all phenomena are empty, how could you possibly cultivate such views! When all phenomena are void and absolutely hollow, how could you possibly cultivate such views!’ It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings teach the Dharma to beings, while maintaining great compassion. Subhūti, this is most wonderful! [F.224.a] It is a marvelous attribute of bodhisattva great beings.

62.32 “Also, Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see bodhisattva great beings teaching the Dharma to beings who are fixated on the view of Brahmā and separating them from those views with the words, ‘Friends, when all phenomena are empty, how could you possibly cultivate such views! When all phenomena are void and absolutely hollow, how could you possibly cultivate such views!’ It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings teach the Dharma to beings, while maintaining great compassion. Subhūti, this is most wonderful! It is a marvelous attribute of bodhisattva great beings.

62.33 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the eastern direction, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see bodhisattva great beings teaching the Dharma to beings, attracting humankind by means of the four attractive qualities. If you ask what are these four, they comprise generosity, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and harmony.

62.34 “Subhūti, when I observe the world from here with the buddha eye, in all the world systems of the southern, western, northern, northeastern, southeastern, southwestern, and northwestern directions, along with the nadir and the zenith, numerous as the grains of sand of the river Gaṅgā, I see bodhisattva great beings teaching the Dharma to beings, attracting humankind by means of the four attractive qualities. If you ask what are these four, they comprise generosity, [F.224.b] pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and harmony.

“Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings attract beings through generosity, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings attract beings through two kinds of gifts. If you ask what are these two, they comprise material gifts and gifts of the Dharma. Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings attract beings through material gifts, in this case, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they give away gold, silver, gems, pearls, beryl, conch, quartz, coral, pure gold, food, drink, parasols, clothing, incense, garlands, unguents, bedding, mats, sustenance, women, men, horses, elephants, or their own [flesh],⁵³¹ whereupon they say, ‘O beings, come here! You may carry off that which is ostensibly mine without having to ask! Take it and go!’ {Ki.VIII: 53} Having bestowed their generosity through that gift, they cause them to take refuge in the buddhas, they cause them to take refuge in the Dharma and they cause them to take refuge in the saṅgha. They encourage some to adopt the five precepts. They cause some to engage in the eightfold observance. They establish some on the paths of the ten virtuous actions. They establish some in the first meditative concentration, some in the second meditative concentration, some in the third meditative concentration, and some in the fourth meditative concentration. They establish some in loving kindness, some in compassion, some in empathetic joy, and some in equanimity. They establish some in the sphere of infinite space, some in the sphere of infinite consciousness, [F.225.a] some in the sphere of nothing-at-all, and some in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. They encourage some toward the recollection of the Buddha, some toward the recollection of the Dharma, some toward the recollection of the Saṅgha, some toward the recollection of ethical discipline, some toward the recollection of giving away, and some toward the recollection of the god realms. They encourage some to examine the perception of the physical body as impurity, and so forth, and some [to examine it] as purity. They encourage some toward the four applications of mindfulness, some toward the four correct exertions, some toward the four supports for miraculous ability, some toward the five faculties, some toward the five powers, some toward the seven branches of enlightenment, and some toward the noble eightfold path. They encourage some toward the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, some toward the eight aspects of liberation, some toward the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, some toward the ten powers of the tathāgatas, some toward the four fearlessnesses, some toward the four kinds of exact knowledge, some toward great loving kindness, some toward great compassion, and some toward the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They encourage some toward to actualization of the thirty-two major marks of a great person, and some toward the eighty minor marks. They encourage some toward the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, some toward the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, some toward the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, some toward arhatship, and some toward individual enlightenment. [F.225.b] They encourage some toward [unsurpassed] enlightenment, some toward knowledge of the path, and some toward all-aspect omniscience. {Ki.VIII: 54} Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, they dispense material gifts to beings and through skillful means establish them in unsurpassed security. This, Subhūti, is a wonderful and marvelous attribute of bodhisattva great beings.

62.36 “Subhūti, if you ask how, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they attract beings with the gift of the Dharma, in this case, Subhūti, the gift of the Dharma is twofold—mundane and supramundane. Subhūti, if you ask what constitutes the mundane gift of the Dharma, it is the description, explanation, and unerring demonstration of mundane phenomena, including impure aspects, along with the four meditative concentrations, the four pure abidings, the four formless absorptions, and the five extrasensory powers. In addition, it includes mundane attributes that are common to ordinary, simple people. These, Subhūti, constitute the mundane gift of the Dharma.

62.37 “Subhūti, having dispensed that mundane gift of the Dharma, bodhisattva great beings through many ways then dissuade beings from accepting mundane dharmas without error, and after dissuading them, they also establish them through skill in means in the noble ones’ dharmas and in the fruits of the noble ones’ dharmas. If you ask what are the noble ones’ dharmas and the fruits of the noble ones’ dharmas, the noble ones’ dharmas comprise the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment and [F.226.a] the three gateways of liberation. The fruits of the noble ones’ dharmas comprise the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship.

62.38 “Subhūti, the noble ones’ dharmas of bodhisattva great beings also include knowledge of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, knowledge of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, knowledge of the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, knowledge of arhatship, knowledge of the perfection of generosity, knowledge of the perfection of ethical discipline, knowledge of the perfection of tolerance, knowledge of the perfection of perseverance, knowledge of the perfection of meditative concentration, knowledge of the perfection of wisdom, knowledge of the emptiness of internal phenomena, and knowledge of [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity; knowledge of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; knowledge of the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers; as well as knowledge of the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways; knowledge of the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and knowledge of great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, and great equanimity. In addition, they include knowledge of mundane and supramundane phenomena, of contaminated and [F.226.b] uncontaminated phenomena, and of conditioned and unconditioned phenomena. {Ki.VIII: 55} With the exception of the wisdom of all-aspect omniscience, these are all the noble ones' dharmas of bodhisattva great beings.

62.39 “Then, if you ask what constitutes the fruit of the noble ones' dharmas of bodhisattva great beings, this denotes the abandonment of all the afflicted mental states and their connecting propensities. This is the fruit of the noble ones' dharmas of bodhisattva great beings.”

62.40 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, will bodhisattva great beings also attain all-aspect omniscience?”

“Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings will also attain all-aspect omniscience.”⁵³²

62.41 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings will also attain all-aspect omniscience, what then is the distinction between bodhisattva great beings and the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas?”

“There is a distinction,” replied the Blessed One.

62.42 “What is the distinction?”

“Bodhisattva great beings will attain all-aspect omniscience, but the tathāgatas are those said to have already acquired that wisdom,” replied the Blessed One. “If you ask why, for those who dwell in it and have attained nonobfuscation with respect to all phenomena, it is not said that the mind of the bodhisattva is one thing and the mind of the tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddhas another. [F.227.a]

62.43 “Such then, Subhūti, is the bodhisattva great beings' mundane gift of Dharma. Based on that, the supramundane gift of Dharma will emerge. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the mundane giving of Dharma, and through skill in means will establish them in the noble ones' supramundane giving of Dharma, and then establish them in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

62.44 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitutes the bodhisattva great beings’ supramundane giving of Dharma that is not shared in common with all ordinary people, it is as follows: the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven aspects of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the three gateways to liberation, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the ten sense fields of complete suffusion, the eight sense fields of mastery, seclusion devoid of afflicted mental states, knowledge based on aspiration, the six extrasensory powers, {Ki.VIII: 56} the four utter purities, the ten controls, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, the three unguarded states, the three consolidations of enlightened intention, the undiminished reality, the renunciation of the obscuration of propensities, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, great loving kindness, great compassion, [F.227.b] the thirty-two major marks and eighty minor marks of a great person, the five hundred dhāraṇī gateways, and the gateways of meditative stability. These are said to constitute the supramundane giving of Dharma.

62.45 “In this regard, Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the four applications of mindfulness, [they comprise mindfulness of body, feelings, thoughts, and phenomena. Bodhisattva great beings] should continue to observe the body—the inner body, the outer body, and the outer and inner body combined. As they conduct themselves, diligent, alert, and mindful, they are rid of the world’s attractions and dissatisfactions. They continue to observe the origin [of suffering] with respect to the body, they continue to observe the cessation [of suffering] with respect to the body, and they continue to observe the origin and cessation [of suffering] with respect to the body. They continue [to do so] without dwelling on the body, and they are not acquisitive of anything at all in the world.

62.46 “They continue to observe inner feelings, outer feelings, outer and inner feelings combined, inner thoughts, outer thoughts, outer and inner thoughts combined, and inner phenomena, outer phenomena, and outer and inner phenomena combined. As they conduct themselves, diligent, alert, and mindful, they are rid of the world’s attractions and dissatisfactions. They continue to observe the origin [of suffering] with respect to phenomena [and so forth], they continue to observe the cessation [of suffering] with respect to phenomena [and so forth], and they continue to observe the origin and cessation [of suffering] with respect to phenomena [and so forth]. They continue [to do so] without dwelling on phenomena [and so forth], and they are not acquisitive of anything at all in the world.

- 62.47 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the four correct exertions, [bodhisattva great beings] resolve that negative and nonvirtuous attributes that have not yet arisen might not be developed. They struggle so that negative and nonvirtuous attributes that have previously arisen might be renounced. They resolve and strive that virtuous attributes that have not yet arisen might be developed. They resolve that virtuous attributes that have previously arisen should flourish and absolutely increase, [F.228.a] their cultivation reaching complete perfection.
- 62.48 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the four supports for miraculous abilities, they comprise the support for miraculous ability that combines the meditative stability of resolution with the formative force of exertion, and the supports for miraculous ability that combine the meditative stabilities of perseverance, thought, and scrutiny with the formative force of exertion.
- 62.49 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the five faculties, they comprise the faculty of faith, the faculty of perseverance, the faculty of recollection, the faculty of meditative stability, and the faculty of wisdom. These are called the five faculties.
- 62.50 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the five powers, they comprise the power of faith, the power of perseverance, the power of recollection, the power of meditative stability, and the power of wisdom. These are called the five powers. {Ki.VIII:57}
- 62.51 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the seven branches of enlightenment, they comprise the branch of enlightenment that entails correct recollection, the branch of enlightenment that entails correct doctrinal analysis, the branch of enlightenment that entails correct perseverance, the branch of enlightenment that entails correct delight, the branch of enlightenment that entails correct mental and physical refinement, the branch of enlightenment that entails correct meditative stability, and the branch of enlightenment that entails correct equanimity. These are called the seven branches of enlightenment.
- 62.52 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitutes the noble eightfold path, it comprises correct view, correct ideation, correct speech, correct action, correct livelihood, correct effort, correct recollection, and correct meditative stability. These are called the noble eightfold path.
- 62.53 “If you ask what constitute the three meditative stabilities, they comprise the meditative stability of emptiness, the meditative stability of signlessness, [F.228.b] and the meditative stability of wishlessness. If you ask what constitutes the meditative stability of emptiness, one-pointedness of mind with respect to the aspects of emptiness and the aspects of voidness—that is called the meditative stability of emptiness. If you ask what constitutes the meditative stability of signlessness, one-pointedness of mind with respect to the aspects of peace and the aspects of signlessness—that is called the meditative stability of signlessness. If you ask what constitutes the meditative stability of wishlessness, one-pointedness of mind with respect to the aspects of impermanence and the aspects of suffering—that is called the meditative stability of wishlessness.

62.54 “If you ask what constitute the eight aspects of liberation, they are as follows: The first aspect of liberation is that which ensues when corporeal beings observe physical forms. The second aspect of liberation is that which ensues when formless beings endowed with internal perception observe external physical forms. The third aspect of liberation ensues when beings are inclined toward pleasant states. The fourth aspect of liberation ensues when one achieves and dwells in the sphere of infinite space. The fifth aspect of liberation ensues when one achieves and dwells in the sphere of infinite consciousness. The sixth aspect of liberation ensues when one achieves and dwells in the sphere of nothing-at-all. The seventh aspect of liberation ensues when one achieves and dwells in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. The eighth aspect of liberation ensues when one achieves and dwells in the cessation of perceptions and feelings. These are called the eight aspects of liberation. {Ki.VIII: 58}

62.55 “If you ask what constitute the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, in this regard, [the first ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the first meditative concentration, that is to say, when there is freedom from desires, and freedom from negative and nonvirtuous attributes, while ideation and scrutiny are present, alongside the joy and bliss that arise from that freedom. [F.229.a] [The second ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the second meditative concentration, that is to say, when there is an intense inner clarity consequent on the calming of ideation and scrutiny—the absence of ideation and the absence of scrutiny being due to one-pointed mental focus—while the joy and bliss that arise from meditative stability are present. [The third ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the third meditative concentration free from joy, abiding in equanimity due to the absence of attachment to joy, while both mindfulness and alertness are present, and bliss is still experienced by the body. This is what sublime beings describe as ‘mindful, abiding in bliss, and equanimous.’ [The fourth ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the fourth meditative concentration, that is to say, when even that sense of bliss is abandoned and suffering has also been eliminated. Here, neither suffering nor bliss is present because even former blissful and unhappy states of mind have subsided, while equanimity and mindfulness are utterly pure. [The fifth ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the sphere of infinite space, that is to say, when the perceptions of physical forms have been completely transcended in all respects, the perceptions of obstructed phenomena have subsided, the mind does not engage with diverse perceptions, and one thereby thinks, 'Space is infinite.' [The sixth ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the sphere of infinite consciousness, that is to say, when the sphere of infinite space has been completely transcended in all respects, and one thinks, 'Consciousness is infinite.' [The seventh ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the sphere of nothing-at-all, that is to say, when the sphere of infinite consciousness has been completely transcended in all respects, and one thinks, 'There is nothing at all.' [The eighth ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, that is to say, when the sphere of nothing-at-all has been completely transcended in all respects. [F.229.b] [The ninth ensues] when someone achieves and then maintains the cessation of perceptions and feelings, that is to say, when the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception has been completely transcended in all respects. These are called the nine serial steps of meditative absorption.

62.56 "If you ask what constitute the ten sense fields of complete suffusion, they comprise the complete suffusion of the earth element, the complete suffusion of the water element, the complete suffusion of the fire element, the complete suffusion of the wind element, the complete suffusion of blueness, the complete suffusion of yellowness, the complete suffusion of redness, the complete suffusion of whiteness, the complete suffusion of consciousness, and the complete suffusion of the space element. These are called the ten sense fields of complete suffusion.

62.57 "If you ask what are the eight sense fields of mastery, they are as follows:⁵³³ The first sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner forms regards subtle external forms,⁵³⁴ along with pleasant colors and unpleasant colors, but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. The second sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner forms regards gross external forms, along with pleasant colors and unpleasant colors, but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. The third sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner formlessness regards subtle external forms, pleasant colors, and unpleasant colors, but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. [F.230.a] The fourth sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner formlessness regards gross external forms, pleasant colors, and unpleasant colors, but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. The fifth sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner formlessness regards blue external forms, blue colors, and blue reflections—blue hues that are as blue, for example, as the flax blossom or [blue] cloth made in Vārāṇasī—but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. The sixth sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner formlessness regards yellow external forms, yellow colors, and yellow reflections—yellow hues that are as yellow, for example, as the cassia flower or [yellow] cloth made in Vārāṇasī—but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. {Ki.VIII: 59} The seventh sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner formlessness regards red external forms, red colors, and red reflections—red hues that are as red, for example, as the pentapetes flower or [red] cloth made in Vārāṇasī—but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them. The eighth sense field of mastery refers to the [miraculous] perceptual transformation that ensues when one who perceives inner formlessness regards white external forms, white colors, and white reflections—white hues that are as white, for example, as the lights of the [morning] star Venus or [white] cloth made in Vārāṇasī— [F.230.b] but understands these forms, having attained mastery over them, and sees them, having attained mastery over them.

62.58 “If you ask what is seclusion devoid of afflicted mental states, this refers to the conduct of bodhisattva great beings, abiding in meditative concentration, who achieve through that meditative stability the power to ensure that the afflicted mental states of other beings and other individuals do not arise. That is called seclusion devoid of afflicted mental states.

62.59 “If you ask what is knowledge based on aspiration, this refers to the knowledge of the three times that bodhisattva great beings acquire or the knowledge that they want when, abiding in meditative concentration, they mentally aspire that ‘this should be known.’ Arising from that meditative stability, they then consummate their aspirations and indeed understand that [specific] knowledge. This is called knowledge based on aspiration.

62.60 “If you ask what are the six extrasensory powers, they comprise the extrasensory power of miraculous abilities, the extrasensory power of divine clairvoyance, the extrasensory power of divine clairauidience, the extrasensory power of knowing the minds of others, the extrasensory power of recollecting past lives, and the extrasensory power of knowing that contaminants have ceased. These are called the six [extrasensory powers].

62.61 “If you ask what are the four utter purities, they comprise the utter purity of the physical body, the utter purity of objective referents, the utter purity of mind, and the utter purity of wisdom. These are called the four [utter purities].

62.62 “If you ask what are the ten controls, they comprise control over the lifespan, control over mind, control over resources, control over actions, control over birth, control over resolve, control over aspiration, control over miraculous abilities, control over wisdom, and control over phenomena. [F.231.a] These are called the ten [controls].

62.63 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the ten powers of the tathāgatas, in this regard, Subhūti, they are as follows: (1) The tathāgatas definitively know that phenomena that are possible are indeed possible. They definitively know that phenomena that are impossible are indeed impossible. (2) They definitively know through contingencies and causes the maturation of the past, future, and present actions [of beings], and of those who undertake such actions. {Ki.VIII: 60} (3) They definitively know various realms and their multiple constituents. (4) They definitively know the diverse volitions and multiple volitions of other beings and other individuals. (5) They definitively know whether the acumen of other beings and other individuals is superior or inferior. (6) They definitively know the paths that lead anywhere. (7) They definitively know [with respect to other beings and other individuals] the faculties, powers, branches of enlightenment, meditative concentrations, aspects of liberation, meditative stabilities, formless absorptions, and defiled or purified mental states that they have established. (8)⁵³⁵ They definitively know with pure divine clairvoyance, surpassing the sight of human beings, [all the circumstances of] beings—they perceive their deaths and rebirths, how they proceed to blissful realms and inferior realms, with pleasant or unpleasant complexions, positive or negative attributes, and how they proceed in accordance with their past actions. (9) They can recollect former lives in their many facets, recollecting a single past life, and from that recollecting anything up to a hundred past lives, a thousand past lives, a hundred thousand past lives, or even a hundred billion trillion past lives. Recollecting even an eon, they can also recollect up to a hundred eons, many hundreds of eons, many thousands of eons, many hundreds of thousands of eons, and even many hundred billion trillions of eons. [F.231.b] They can recollect and make statements about aspects of many former lives, along with their whereabouts and circumstances, saying, ‘I was such [an individual]. My name was this. My family was this. My clan was this. This was the food I ate. This was the duration I lived. The limits of my lifespan were of that extent.' And, 'After I died and transmigrated, I was born as so-and-so, and then after dying and transmigrating I have been born here.' (10) They definitively know the liberation of mind, the liberation of wisdom, and the state that is free from contaminants because all contaminants have ceased. As such they know that these beings conduct themselves physically in negative ways, these conduct themselves verbally in negative ways, these conduct themselves mentally in negative ways, these deprecate the noble ones, these hold wrong views, and for such reasons once their body has perished they will fall into negative, inferior realms and be reborn in the hells. These beings, on the other hand, conduct themselves physically in positive ways, these conduct themselves verbally in positive ways, these conduct themselves mentally in positive ways, these do not deprecate the noble ones, these hold genuine views, and for such reasons, once their body has perished, they will proceed to the blissful exalted realms and be reborn among the gods. These ten are the powers of the tathāgatas. [F.232.a] 62.64 "Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the four fearlessnesses [claimed by] the tathāgatas, they are as follows: (1) When I claim to have attained completely awakened buddhahood, if some virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or any other creature should say that I have not attained consummate buddhahood with respect to these [particular] dharmas here, I would correctly disregard that reason for contradicting me, based on their worldly doctrines. By correctly disregarding that reason, I have found ease and dwell in it. To have attained this absence of trepidation is to have attained fearlessness. I claim my exalted place as a great leader. I will rightly roar the lion's roar in the midst of the assembly! I will turn the wheel of Brahmā that has not previously been turned in the world, in conformity with the Dharma, by any virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or anyone else!

62.65 (2) "When I claim I am one whose contaminants have ceased, if some virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or any other creature should say that these [particular] contaminants [of mine] have not ceased, I would correctly disregard that reason for contradicting me, based on their worldly doctrines. By correctly disregarding that reason, I have found ease and dwell in it. To have attained this absence of trepidation is to have attained fearlessness. I claim my exalted place as a great leader. I will rightly roar the lion's roar in the midst of the assembly! I will turn the wheel of Brahmā which has not previously been turned in the world, in conformity with the Dharma, by any virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or anyone else! [F.232.b]

- 62.66 (3) “When I claim to have explained those phenomena that cause obstacles [on the spiritual path], if some virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or any other creature should insist that even though one might depend on those phenomena, there will be no obstacles, I would correctly disregard that reason for contradicting me, based on their worldly doctrines. By correctly disregarding that reason, I have found ease and dwell in it. To have attained this absence of trepidation is to have attained fearlessness. I claim my exalted place as a great leader. I will rightly roar the lion’s roar in the midst of the assembly! I will turn the wheel of Brahmā which has not previously been turned in the world, in conformity with the Dharma, by any virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or anyone else!
- 62.67 (4) “When I claim to have shown the path that leads to realizing the emancipation of the noble and that will genuinely bring an end to suffering for those who make use of it, if some virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or any other creature should say that even if one emphasizes this [path], suffering will not cease, I would correctly disregard that reason for contradicting me, based on their worldly doctrines. By correctly disregarding that reason, I have found ease and dwell in it. To have attained this absence of trepidation is to have attained fearlessness. I claim my exalted place as a great leader. I will rightly roar the lion’s roar in the midst of the assembly! I will turn the wheel of Brahmā which has not previously been turned in the world, in conformity with the Dharma, by any virtuous ascetic, brahmin, god, demon, Brahmā, or anyone else! [F.233.a] These four are called the fearlessnesses.⁵³⁶
- 62.68 “If you ask what constitute the four kinds of exact knowledge of the tathāgatas, they comprise exact knowledge of meanings, exact knowledge of dharmas, exact knowledge of their language and lexical explanations, and exact knowledge of their eloquent expression. If you ask what these entail, they respectively refer to meanings, to dharmas, to language and lexical explanations, and to eloquent expression.⁵³⁷
- 62.69 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the three unguarded states of the tathāgatas, the tathāgatas are endowed with pure conduct of body, and since they do not act impurely with their bodies, the tathāgatas have no wish to stop anyone who comes to find out if this is so. That is the first unguarded state. The tathāgatas are endowed with pure conduct of speech, and since they are without impure conduct of speech, the tathāgatas have no wish to stop anyone who comes to find out if this is so. That is the second unguarded state. The tathāgatas are endowed with pure conduct of mind, and since they are without impure conduct of mind, the tathāgatas have no wish to stop anyone who comes to find out if this is so. That is the third unguarded state.

62.70 “If you ask, in that regard, what are the three consolidations of the tathāgatas’ attitude, when the tathāgatas teach the Dharma, even when there are some who listen attentively with their ears cocked, focusing their minds on paying attention, [F.233.b] and emphasizing care for the Dharma, the tathāgatas will not be delighted, comforted, or distracted by that. This is the first consolidation of their attitude. Even when there are some who do not listen attentively with their ears cocked, focus their minds on paying attention, or emphasize care for the Dharma, the tathāgatas will not be angered by that, they will not become intolerant, and they will not lose confidence. This is the second consolidation of their attitude. Even when there are some who do listen attentively with their ears cocked, focusing their minds on paying attention, and emphasizing care for the Dharma, and others who do not listen attentively with their ears cocked, focusing their minds on paying attention, or emphasizing care for the Dharma, the tathāgatas will neither be delighted nor angered by that, and they will maintain equanimity with their mind and understanding directed toward them all. This is the third consolidation of their attitude. {Ki.VIII: 61}

62.71 “If you ask what is the undiminished reality of the tathāgatas, it is that through which the lord buddhas never cease to act for the benefit of all beings, in order to teach the Dharma that is meaningful. This is called the undiminished reality.

62.72 “If you ask what is the tathāgatas’ renunciation of the obscuration of propensities: the śrāvakas and pratyekabuddhas, even though they have all renounced afflicted mental states, still undergo the transformations of the physical body, but the tathāgatas do not. This is called the tathāgatas’ renunciation of the obscuration of propensities.

62.73 “If you ask what constitutes the great compassion of the tathāgatas, according to worldly convention, [F.234.a] the tathāgatas who are endowed with great compassion are said to reflect at all times—thrice during the day and thrice during the night—in order to inspect the roots of virtuous action. That is to say, the great compassion of the lord buddhas in actuality always appears to inspect the infinite beings who are to be brought to maturation. This is called great compassion.

62.74 “Subhūti, if you ask what constitute the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas that the tathāgatas have, they are as follows: (1) the tathāgatas are without clumsiness; (2) they are not noisy; (3) they are without false memories; (4) they are without differentiating perceptions; (5) they are without uncomposed minds; (6) they are without the indifference that lacks discernment; (7) they do not degenerate in their resolution; (8) they do not degenerate in their perseverance; (9) they do not degenerate in their recollection; (10) they do not degenerate in their meditative stability; (11) they do not degenerate in their wisdom; (12) they do not degenerate in their liberation, nor do they degenerate in their seeing the wisdom of liberation; (13) all the activities of their bodies are preceded by wisdom and followed by wisdom; (14) all the activities of their speech are preceded by wisdom and followed by wisdom; (15) all the activities of their minds are preceded by wisdom and followed by wisdom; (16) they engage in the perception of wisdom that is unobstructed and unimpeded with respect to the past; (17) they engage in the perception of wisdom that is unobstructed and unimpeded with respect to the future; and (18) they engage in the perception of wisdom that is unobstructed and unimpeded with respect to the present. These comprise the distinct qualities of the buddhas.

62.75 “Subhūti, if you ask what is the all-aspect omniscience of the tathāgatas, its defining characteristic is that there are no defining characteristics in that which is without apprehending, controlled by mindfulness, and [F.234.b] quiescent. This is called all-aspect omniscience. [B68]

62.76 “If you ask what are the thirty-two major marks of a great person that the tathāgatas have, they are as follows: (1) They have hands and feet that are marked with the motif of the wheel. (2) They have feet that are well positioned. (3) They are endowed with hands and feet that are webbed. (4) They have hands and feet that are tender and soft. (5) They have seven prominent parts [the backs of the legs, the arms, the shoulders, and the nape]. (6) They have long toes and fingers. (7) They are endowed with broad heels. (8) They have a body that is tall and upright. (9) They have legs that are ample, [making the ankle bones inconspicuous]. (10) Their limbs have body hairs that curl upward. (11) They are endowed with calves resembling those of Śarabha Aiṇeya, the king of ungulates. (12) They are endowed with arms that reach down the thighs when standing upright. (13) They are endowed with a contracted male organ. (14) They are endowed with a golden complexion. (15) They are endowed with skin of extremely delicate complexion. (16) They are endowed with head hair that grows distinctly, curling to the right. (17) Their face is adorned with a hair ringlet [between the eyebrows]. (18) Their torso resembles that of a lion.⁵³⁸ (19) They are endowed with amply curved and elegant shoulders. (20) They are endowed with extremely broad collarbones. (21) They are endowed with a superior organ of taste. (22) They are endowed with a girth like the banyan tree. (23) They are endowed with the uṣṇīṣa on the crown of the head. (24) They are endowed with an extremely long [and slender] tongue. (25) They are endowed with the divine voice of Brahmā. (26) They are endowed with lion-like jaws. (27) They are endowed with extremely white teeth. (28) They are endowed with extremely even teeth. (29) They are endowed with close-fitting teeth. (30) They are endowed with a full set of forty even teeth. (31) The whites of their eyes and dark pupils are sharply demarcated. (32) They have eyelashes like those of a cow.

62.77 “Concerning these [thirty-two major marks], (1) the tathāgatas’ hands and feet are marked with the motif of a wheel with a thousand spokes, {Ki.VIII: 62} a hub, and a circumference, which are complete in all respects, as if they had been carved from bone or ivory. That is how their hands and feet are marked with the motif of the wheel. (2) Their feet are well positioned since the two soles of the feet evenly touch the ground, without wobbling. [F.235.a] (3) They are endowed with hands and feet that are webbed in that their fingers and toes are webbed together in the manner of the king of swans. (4) They have hands and feet that are tender and soft—they are extremely soft and tender, like a ball of tree cotton. (5) They are endowed with seven prominent parts in that the arms, legs, shoulders, and nape are amply formed. (6) They have long toes and fingers in that their fingers and toes are [unusually] long. (7) They are endowed with broad heels in that their heels are [unusually] long. (8) They have a body that is tall and upright as they are [unusually] tall, exceeding seven cubits in height. (9) They have legs that are ample in that the kneecaps and ankle bones are inconspicuous. (10) Their limbs have body hairs that curl upward as their hairs point upward, curling to the right. (11) They are endowed with calves resembling those of Śarabha Aiṇeya, the king of ungulates, in that their calves are tapered and round like the calves of the ungulate Aiṇeya, or like bamboo or grass stems. (12) They are endowed with arms that reach down the thighs when standing upright, since, standing upright and without bending down, the palms of both hands can touch the kneecaps. (13) They are endowed with a contracted male organ, their male organ being sheathed in an aesthetically pleasing manner, like a thoroughbred elephant or a thoroughbred horse. (14) They are endowed with a golden complexion in that they have a color resembling the purest gold. (15) They are endowed with skin of extremely delicate complexion as it is delicate and smooth in complexion, like the purest gold or silver, such that no dust adheres to their body. (16) They are endowed with hairs that grow distinctly, curling to the right, their body hairs being well separated and growing distinctly and not in twos. (17) Their face is adorned with a hair ringlet in that they are embellished with a hair ringlet between the eyebrows that is as [white] in color as a water lily, the moon, milk, or hoarfrost, with a luminosity surpassing even a hundred suns and moons. (18) Their torso resembles that of a lion,⁵³⁹ being [unusually] large. (19) They are endowed with amply curved and elegant shoulders, these being tightly articulated [F.235.b] with the neck and amply rounded. (20) They are endowed with extremely broad collarbones, their collarbones being well formed, like polished golden door bolts. (21) They are endowed with a superior organ of taste because no disorders of wind, bile, or phlegm impair it, and its consciousness is matchless. (22) They are endowed with a girth like the banyan tree in that the length of their body is proportionate to its width. (23) They are endowed with the uṣṇīṣa on the crown of the head with the head being proportionate, well formed, and elegant, and the uṣṇīṣa being round and excellent, coiled to the right. (24) They are endowed with an extremely long and slender tongue in that the tongue is extremely long, and it resembles the color of the petals of a red lotus flower. (25) They are endowed with the divine voice of Brahmā, their voice being like that of Brahmā or the kalaviṅka bird. (26) They are endowed with lion-like jaws in that their jaws are well formed, beautifully developed like the surface of a mirror, and pleasant. (27) They are endowed with extremely white teeth, as they have teeth that are extremely white like water lilies or fragments of conch. (28) They are endowed with extremely even teeth, their teeth being positioned neither too high nor too low. (29) They are endowed with close-fitting teeth in that their teeth are without gaps between them. (30) They are endowed with a full set of forty even teeth in that the upper and lower sets are not crooked. (31) They have eyes of which the whites of the eye and dark pupil are sharply demarcated, those light and dark parts of the eyes being distinct, utterly pure, and uncovered by redness. {Ki.VIII: 63} (32) They have eyelashes like those of a cow in that the upper and lower lashes are well positioned and untangled.

62.78 “In this regard, (1) they have hands and feet that are marked with the motif of the wheel because they have received and accompanied spiritual teachers, sat listening to the Dharma, and paid their respects to temples, stūpas, and so forth. This is a prior indication that they will have an extremely large assembly. (2) They have feet that are well positioned because they have been steadfast in their commitments. This is a prior indication that they will be unswerving and extremely steadfast. [F.236.a] (3) They are endowed with hands and feet that are webbed because they have become familiar with the four attractive qualities—generosity, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and harmony. This is a prior indication that they will swiftly gather [disciples]. (4–5) They have hands and feet that are tender and soft and they are endowed with seven prominent parts because they have granted the enjoyment of delicious food, delicacies, and drink. These two are prior indications that they will receive delicious food, delicacies, and drink. (6–8) They have long toes and fingers, broad heels, and a body that is tall and upright because they have released [living creatures] from bondage, acted in the service of living things, and renounced the killing of living creatures. These are prior indications that they will have a long lifespan. (9–10) They have legs that are well rounded, [making the ankle bones inconspicuous,] and their limbs have body hairs that curl upward because they have adopted virtuous attributes and, having grasped them, enhanced them, without permitting them to be eclipsed. These are prior indications that they will possess attributes that do not degenerate. (11) They are endowed with calves resembling those of Śarabha Aiṇeya, the king of ungulates, because they have acted in the service of classical learning and the arts [in particular], they have donated [works] to others, and they have acquired them themselves. This is a prior indication that they will swiftly acquire [such works]. (12) They are endowed with arms that reach down the thighs when standing upright because, when asked for the property and wealth that they possessed, they have given it without dismay and without refusing to do so. This is a prior indication that they will possess and master resources. (13) They are endowed with a contracted male organ because they have exhorted associates, friends, allies who do not live apart, and those beings who do live apart to practice chastity, and they have guarded words of secrecy. This is a prior indication that they will have many [spiritual] heirs. (14–15) They are endowed with a golden complexion and skin of extremely delicate complexion because they have donated seats, clothing, houses, palaces, and excellent dwellings. These two are prior indications that they will acquire seats, clothing, houses, palaces, and excellent dwellings. (16–17) They are endowed with hairs that grow distinctly, curling to the right, and their face is adorned with a hair ringlet [between the eyebrows] because they have abandoned social diversions, and served, revered, and obeyed their superiors, including preceptors, masters, parents, and siblings, in the appropriate manner. [F.236.b] These are prior indications that they will be peerless. (18–19) Their torso resembles that of a lion and they are endowed with amply curved and elegant shoulders because they neither speak unpleasant words nor do they scold anyone, but maintain harmony, speaking pleasant words with eloquence. These are prior indications that they will be invincible. (20–21) They are endowed with extremely broad collarbones and a superior organ of taste because they have donated medicines, aid, medical treatment, {Ki.VIII: 64} and beneficial foods to invalids. These are prior indications that they will have few illnesses. (22–23) They are endowed with a girth like the banyan tree, and the uṣṇīṣa on the crown of the head, because they have themselves given to others and previously dispensed the things that others have wished for, including meadows, retinues, beverages, pools, bridges spanning places hard to cross, food, garlands, platforms, and temples. These are prior indications that they will acquire great dominion. (24–25) They are endowed with an extremely long and slender tongue and the divine voice of Brahmā because over a long time they have spoken pleasant, gentle, and comforting words. These two are prior indications that they will possess speech endowed with five qualities, which comprise [speech that is] (i) comprehensible and sensible, (ii) delightful to hear and lacking in discord, (iii) deep and melodious, (iv) clear and pleasant to the ears, and (v) undisturbed and lucid. (26) They are endowed with lion-like jaws because for a long time they have abandoned nonsensical chatter and speak in a timely manner. This is a prior indication that their words will be heard by all. (27–28) They are endowed with extremely white teeth and extremely even teeth because they have engaged in pure livelihood through both acts of service and words that are without contempt. [F.237.a] These are prior indications that they will have an entourage that has previously been assembled. (29–30) They are endowed with close-fitting teeth and a full set of forty even teeth because over a long time they have spoken words that are true and without slander. These are prior indications that they will not be separated from their entourage. (31–32) They have [deep blue eyes] in which the light and dark parts are distinct, and they have eyelashes like those of a cow, because they gaze [upon beings] with eyes devoid of attachment, hatred, and delusion, without considering their defects, as if embracing them on their lap [like a mother]. These are prior indications that they will be beautiful in all respects. Subhūti, these are the thirty-two major marks of a great person that the tathāgatas possess.

- 62.79 “If you ask what constitute the tathāgatas’ eighty minor marks, they are as follows:⁵⁴⁰ (1) The lord buddhas are endowed with copper-colored nails—that is to say, they are detached from any conditioning. (43) The lord buddhas have hands with brilliant lines—indicating that they have acquired the status of a great ascetic owing to their loving kindness for kinsmen, and ordinary people. (44) The lord buddhas have hands with deep lines—indicating that they are extremely profound and steadfast. (45) The lord buddhas have hands with long lines—indicating that they teach the expansive doctrine of tolerance. (46) The lord buddhas are endowed with a face that is not too long—indicating that they establish and make known the topics of training in not too long a time. (47) The lord buddhas are endowed with a face that appears like a form being reflected—indicating that they have reflections that spread forth in the world. (48) The lord buddhas are endowed with a tongue that is extremely soft—indicating that they have first gently mollified and then disciplined [their disciples]. (49) The lord buddhas are endowed with a tongue that is extremely slender—indicating that they possess a mass of subtle enlightened attributes. (50) The lord buddhas are endowed with a tongue that is extremely red—indicating that the profundity of their Dharma and Vinaya is hard for ordinary attached persons to estimate. (51) The lord buddhas are endowed with a voice like the trumpeting of an elephant or the roar of a dragon—indicating that they are without trepidation, just like the trumpeting of an elephant or the roar of a dragon. (52) The lord buddhas are endowed with speech that is pleasant, gentle, and comforting—indicating that they have disciples whose speech is pleasant, gentle, and comforting. (53) The lord buddhas are endowed with teeth that are extremely round—indicating that they have transcended the fetters of the rebirth process. (54) [F.239.a] The lord buddhas are endowed with teeth that are sharp—indicating that they discipline living creatures who are sharp. (55) The lord buddhas are endowed with teeth that are extremely white—indicating that their Dharma and Vinaya are extremely pure. (56) The lord buddhas are endowed with teeth that are even—indicating that they are evenly established in the [bodhisattva] levels. (57) The lord buddhas are endowed with teeth that are tapering—indicating that they teach the Dharma in which clear realization gradually emerges. (58) The lord buddhas are endowed with a nose that is prominent—indicating that they are seated on the prominent mountain of wisdom. (59) The lord buddhas are endowed with a nose that is extremely clean—indicating that they have as disciples persons who are clean. (60) The lord buddhas are endowed with eyes that are long—indicating that they have the attributes of the buddhas that are perfectly vast. (61) The lord buddhas are endowed with eyes that are pure—indicating that their vision is extremely pure. (62) The lord buddhas are endowed with eyelashes that are dense—indicating that they have amassed a large congregation of beings. {Ki.VIII: 67} (63) The lord buddhas are endowed with eyes like lotus petals, in which the light and dark parts are distinct—indicating that they delight gods, asuras, human beings, and the foremost of youth with their eyes like lotus petals, in which the white sclera and dark iris are distinct. (64) The lord buddhas are endowed with long eyebrows—indicating that they always have an expansive vision. (65) The lord buddhas are endowed with soft eyebrows—indicating that they are expert in gentle discipline. (66) The lord buddhas have eyebrows with hairs of even length—indicating that they understand all faults. (67) The lord buddhas have shiny eyebrows—indicating that they discipline persons to be mollified with the moist oil of the roots of virtuous action. (68) [F.239.b] The lord buddhas are endowed with excellent ears and long earlobes—indicating that they have extensive understanding of the supreme phenomenon. (69) The lord buddhas are endowed with ears of equal size—indicating that they have triumphed over the continuum of afflicted mental states. (70) The lord buddhas are endowed with sense organs of hearing that are undiminished—indicating that they discipline beings of undiminished aspiration. (71) The lord buddhas are endowed with a forehead that is well formed—indicating that they have refined all aspects of the view. (72) The lord buddhas are endowed with a forehead that is broad—indicating that they absolutely discipline those expounding opposing arguments. (73) The lord buddhas are endowed with a head that is very broad—indicating that they have absolutely perfected genuine aspirations. (74) The lord buddhas are endowed with hair as black as a bee—indicating that they have averted the bees of the sense objects. (75) The lord buddhas are endowed with thick hair—indicating that they have ended the latent impulses that are abandoned through [the paths of] insight and cultivation. (76) The lord buddhas are endowed with soft hair—indicating that their gentle mind comprehends the essence of the teaching. (77) The lord buddhas are endowed with untangled hair—indicating that they have a mind that is always undisturbed. (78) The lord buddhas are endowed with smooth hair—indicating that they are utterly devoid of harsh speech. (79) The lord buddhas are endowed with fragrant hair—indicating that they have established living creatures in harmony with the perfumed flowers of the branches of enlightenment. (80) The lord buddhas have hands and feet adorned with the glorious śrīvatsa motif, the auspicious svāstika motif, and the nandyāvarta motif. [F.240.a] Subhūti, these constitute the eighty minor marks of the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas.⁵⁴¹

62.80 “So it is, Subhūti, that the explaining, teaching, and demonstrating of attributes such as these to others is called the gift of the supramundane doctrine. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings attract beings with material gifts and the gift of the Dharma. This, Subhūti, is indeed a wonderful and marvelous doctrine of bodhisattva great beings.

62.81 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings attract beings with their pleasant speech, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings attract beings through the six perfections. Thus, it is by means of the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom—all these six perfections—that bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their pleasant speech. If you ask why, it is because there are no virtuous attributes that are not subsumed in these six perfections. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their pleasant speech.⁵⁴²

62.82 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their purposeful activity, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their purposeful activity by means of these six perfections. If you ask why, it is because there are no virtuous attributes that are not subsumed in these six perfections. It is in this manner, Subhūti, [F.240.b] that bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their purposeful activity.⁵⁴³

- 62.83 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their harmony, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their harmony by means of these six perfections. If you ask why, it is because there are no virtuous attributes that are not subsumed in these six perfections. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings attract beings through their harmony. This too, Subhūti, is a wonderful and marvelous doctrine of bodhisattva great beings.⁵⁴⁴
- 62.84 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they instruct other bodhisattva great beings and teach them the Dharma, saying, ‘Come here, noble children! May you become skilled in the formation of syllables! That is to say, may you become skilled in the formation of a single syllable! May you become skilled in the formation of anything from two syllables up to the forty-two syllables!’⁵⁴⁵ May you realize all the natural expressions [of speech] that are refined through a single syllable. May you realize all the natural expressions [of speech] that are refined through two syllables. {Ki.VIII: 68} May you realize all the natural expressions [of speech] that are refined through anything up to forty-two syllables! May you cultivate the gathering of anything up to and including forty-two syllables in a single syllable! May you cultivate the gathering of a single syllable in the forty-two syllables!’
- 62.85 “Subhūti, those bodhisattva great beings should be skilled in cultivating the gathering of the forty-two syllables in a single syllable, [F.241.a] and they should be skilled in cultivating the gathering of a single syllable within the forty-two syllables. When in that manner they have mastered the formation of syllables, they should then become skilled in the formation of [speech] that is without syllables. For example, Subhūti, the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are skilled in the Dharma and skilled in syllables, and since they are skilled in the Dharma and skilled in syllables, they teach through multiple syllables the Dharma that is without syllables. And yet, Subhūti, that Dharma is not quite divorced from the form of the syllables. This too, Subhūti, is a wonderful and marvelous doctrine of bodhisattva great beings, which is not shared in common with any of the śrāvakas or pratyekabuddhas.”
- 62.86 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if, owing to the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end, beings, too, are absolutely nonapprehensible, nor indeed is the Dharma apprehensible, and nor indeed is the entity of the Dharma apprehensible, then, Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity? How do they practice the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions? How do they practice the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment? How do they practice the fourteen aspects of emptiness?⁵⁴⁶ How do they practice the meditative stabilities of emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness? How do they practice the eight aspects of liberation? [F.241.b] How do they practice the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, the thirty-two major marks of a great person, and the eighty excellent minor marks? How do they then maintain the six extrasensory powers that originate from the ripening [of past actions] and teach the Dharma to beings?

62.87 “In this regard, beings are not apprehended, nor is the concept ‘being’ even apprehended. Since beings are not apprehended, physical forms are not apprehensible. Since beings are not apprehended, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not apprehensible. Since beings are not apprehended, [the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are not apprehensible. Since beings are not apprehended, [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not apprehensible. Since beings are not apprehended, the thirty-two major marks of a great person are not apprehensible, and the eighty excellent minor marks are not apprehensible. Since beings are not apprehensible, beings are not discerned. Physical forms are not discerned. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not discerned. [The causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, are not discerned. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not discerned. The thirty-two major marks of a great person are not discerned, and the eighty excellent minor marks are not discerned. {Ki.VIII: 69} If one were to ask why, Blessed Lord, it is because when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, if even the nature of a bodhisattva is not apprehended, how could the factors conducive to enlightenment possibly be apprehended!” [F.242.a]

62.88 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Subhūti, it is because beings are not apprehended that the emptiness of internal phenomena should be known, the emptiness of external phenomena should be known, the emptiness of both external and internal phenomena should be known, and [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, should be known. [It is because beings are not apprehended that] the emptiness of the aggregates should be known, the emptiness of the sensory elements should be known, the emptiness of the sense fields should be known, the emptiness of the links of dependent origination should be known, the emptiness of the [noble] truths should be known, the emptiness of the self should be known, the emptiness of beings should be known, and the emptiness of life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, persons, actors, agents, petitioners, instigators, experiencers, instigators of experience, knowers, and viewers should be known. [It is because beings are not apprehended that] the emptiness of the applications of mindfulness should be known, and that the emptiness of the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path should be known. [It is because beings are not apprehended that] the emptiness of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas should be known. [It is because beings are not apprehended that] the emptiness of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, [F.242.b] the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment should be known. [It is because beings are not apprehended that] the emptiness of knowledge of the path and all-aspect omniscience should be known. [It is because beings are not apprehended that] the emptiness of the buddhafi elds should be known, the emptiness of the buddhas should be known, and the emptiness of the bodhisattvas should be known.

62.89 “In this regard, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, having seen all phenomena as emptiness, they teach the Dharma to beings who have resorted to erroneous views. Just as they do not at all engage with those aspects of emptiness, they teach [the Dharma] accordingly. Perceiving in this way, they know all phenomena to be without obscuration, and then, without disturbing anything at all and without dualizing, they indeed teach [this Dharma], exactly as it is. Subhūti, just as when an emanation of the tathāgatas projects many tens of millions of phantoms, some of whom engage in the perfection of generosity toward beings, and some engage in the perfection of ethical discipline, some in the perfection of tolerance, some in the perfection of perseverance, some in the perfection of meditative concentration, and some in the perfection of wisdom; while some engage in the four meditative concentrations, some in the four immeasurable attitudes, some in the four formless absorptions, some in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, some in the four truths of the noble ones, some in the eight aspects of liberation, some in the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, some in emptiness, signlessness, {Ki.VIII: 70} and wishlessness, and some in the five extrasensory powers; while some engage in all the meditative stabilities and some in all the dhāraṇī gateways, [F.243.a] some in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, some in the four fearlessnesses, some in the four kinds of exact knowledge, some in great loving kindness, some in great compassion, and some in the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and while some engage in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, some engage in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth [within cyclic existence], some in the fruit of not being reborn [within cyclic existence], some in arhatship, some in individual enlightenment, and some in [the other goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do you think, Subhūti, that that emanation would have differentiated anything at all?"

"No, Blessed Lord!"

62.90 "Similarly, Subhūti," continued the Blessed One, "when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they teach the Dharma to beings, and after releasing them from erroneous views, they establish them definitively [on the bodhisattva levels] in a manner that is neither bound nor liberated. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because physical forms are neither bound nor liberated. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are neither bound nor liberated. [The attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are neither bound nor liberated. Nor does the nonbondage and nonliberation of physical forms constitute physical forms. The nonbondage and nonliberation of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness do not constitute consciousness [and so forth]. The nonbondage and nonliberation of [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do not constitute all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. If you ask why, it is because physical forms are absolutely pure. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are absolutely pure. [F.243.b] [The attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are absolutely pure.

62.91 "So it is, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do teach the Dharma to beings, but they do not apprehend beings. Bodhisattva great beings do not apprehend anything, and they dwell without apprehending anything. They dwell in a nondwelling manner with respect to the emptiness of physical forms; in a nondwelling manner with respect to the emptiness of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; and without apprehending anything at all with respect to the emptiness of [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. That is to say, in no respect do they dwell in conditioned or unconditioned phenomena. If you ask why, it is because they do not apprehend any such essential nature in which they should dwell. Nonentities do not dwell in nonentity. Intrinsic entities do not dwell in intrinsic entities, nor do extraneous entities dwell in extraneous entities. If you ask why, it is because they are all nonapprehensible, and that which is nonapprehensible does not dwell in anything at all. So it is that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they thoroughly distinguish all these attributes in accordance with all the [aforementioned] aspects of emptiness. {Ki.VIII:71}

62.92 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner should not denigrate the lord buddhas, bodhisattva great beings, pratyekabuddhas, śrāvakas, or any of the sublime beings. If you ask why, it is because those lord buddhas, those bodhisattva great beings, those pratyekabuddhas, and those śrāvakas, too, [F.244.a] all attain realization in pursuit of this reality; and, having attained realization in pursuit of this reality, they also teach the Dharma to beings, and they do not transcend the reality of all phenomena. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because the realm of phenomena is not transcended; the real nature and the very limit of reality are not transcended. If you ask why, it is because they are without any essential nature that might be transcended.”

62.93 The venerable Subhūti then asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if in that manner the realm of phenomena is not transcended, and the real nature and the very limit of reality are also not transcended, then are physical forms not one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another? Are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness not one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another? Are [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, not one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another?”

62.94 “Subhūti, that is not so!” replied the Blessed One. “It is not the case that physical forms are one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another. It is not the case that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another. It is not the case that [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another.” [F.244.b]

62.95 “Blessed Lord, if physical forms are not one thing, and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another; and if feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another; and if [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are not one thing and the realm of phenomena another, the real nature another, and the very limit of reality another, {Ki.VIII: 72} then how would the fruits of any attributes be established? How would the positive and negative ripening of positive and negative attributes cause beings to experience happiness and suffering—that is to say, how would the negative ripening of negative attributes cause them to experience suffering in the hells, the animal realm, and the world of Yama, and how would the positive ripening of positive attributes cause them to experience the happiness of gods and humans? How would the neither positive nor negative ripening of neither positive nor negative attributes establish them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

62.96 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the systematic presentation of the [various] fruits may be disclosed when relative truth is taken as the standard, but the systematic presentation of the fruits cannot be disclosed through ultimate truth. If you ask why, it is because [in ultimate truth] phenomena cannot be conceived, cannot be described, and are without conventional terms. So the true existence of name and the true existence of form are nonarising, unceasing, without affliction, and without purification. This is the emptiness of the unlimited and the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end.” [F.245.a]

62.97 “Blessed Lord, if the systematic presentation of the fruits is dependent on relative truth and not ultimate truth, would not all ordinary people also attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

62.98 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “do ordinary people understand relative truth or ultimate truth? If they do understand, they would also be established in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. On the contrary, Subhūti, ordinary people are without the path and also without the systematic presentation of the path. Since they do not even cultivate the path, how could ordinary people possibly establish the fruits! Rather, Subhūti, it is the sublime individuals who are endowed with the path. Since it is they who cultivate the path, it is these sublime individuals who partake of the systematic presentation of the fruits.”

62.99 “Blessed Lord, will the fruit then be attained by those who have cultivated the path, or is the fruit attainable?”

“No, Subhūti!” replied the Blessed One. “The fruit will not be attained by those who have cultivated the path, nor indeed is the fruit attainable through the path. Subhūti, the fruit will not be attained without cultivating the path, but neither is the fruit attainable through the path, and the fruit will not be attained without abiding on the path. It is in this way, Subhūti, [F.245.b] that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they may through skill in means establish beings in the fruit, but the fruit is not established by having eradicated conditioned elements or unconditioned elements.”

62.100 “Blessed Lord, if the fruit is not established by eradicating conditioned or unconditioned elements, then when the Blessed One says that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is consequent on having renounced the three fetters, that the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth is consequent on having reduced the desires and malice associated with [the realm of] desire, that the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth is consequent on having renounced the five fetters associated with the lower realms [of desire], that arhatship is consequent on having renounced the five fetters associated with the higher realms [of form and formlessness], that individual enlightenment is consequent on having understood that all phenomena whatsoever originating from causes are phenomena that will cease, and that complete enlightenment is consequent on having abandoned all afflicted mental states associated with reincarnation through the continuity of propensities, how should I understand the Blessed One’s statement that the fruit of conditioned and unconditioned phenomena is not established by eradicating them?”

62.101 “Subhūti,” asked the Blessed One in return, “are the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment conditioned, or unconditioned?”

“Blessed Lord, all these are unconditioned.”

62.102 “Well then, Subhūti, can unconditioned phenomena be eradicated?” asked the Blessed One.

“No, Blessed Lord!”

62.103 The Blessed One asked further, “Subhūti, [F.246.a] when noble sons or noble daughters realize that conditioned and unconditioned phenomena have one defining characteristic, namely that they are without defining characteristics, at that time do you think that they eradicate anything at all that is conditioned or unconditioned?” {Ki.VIII: 74}

“No, Blessed Lord!”

62.104 “Similarly, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, owing to the emptiness of internal phenomena, and owing to [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity, they do not teach the Dharma to beings by eradicating anything. They themselves do not become fixated on anything at all—whether the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of wisdom, the first meditative concentration, the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, the fourth meditative concentration, loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, equanimity, absorption in the sphere of infinite space, absorption in the sphere of infinite consciousness, absorption in the sphere of nothing-at-all, absorption in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble [eightfold] path, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions,⁵⁴⁷ the eight aspects of liberation, [F.246.b] the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, or [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

62.105 “Since they are without fixation, they remain unattached to anything at all. This is just as when the emanations of a tathāgata dispense generosity—they remain unattached to the fruit of that generosity and do not experience the fruit of that generosity. In addition, even though they may dispense generosity in order that all beings might attain final nirvāṇa, and also cultivate the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, as well as contaminated and uncontaminated attributes, or mundane, supramundane, conditioned, and unconditioned attributes, even so they remain unattached to the fruits of these conditioned and unconditioned attributes [and so forth], and they do not experience the fruits of these conditioned and unconditioned attributes [and so forth]. Apart from that, they may cultivate the conditioned and unconditioned attributes in order that all beings might attain final nirvāṇa. In the same way, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections and all those attributes, but they do not dwell in and are unattached to anything at all. If you ask why, [F.247.a] it is because they thoroughly comprehend the defining characteristic of phenomena, of which all phenomena partake.”

62.106 This completes the sixty-second chapter, “Teaching the Manifestation of the Major and Minor Marks and the Perfection of Wisdom,” from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

63. CHAPTER 63: THE TEACHING ON SAMENESS

63.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings realize the defining characteristic of phenomena, of which all phenomena partake?”

63.2 “Phantom emanations do not indulge in desire, hatred, or delusion,” replied the Blessed One. “They do not indulge in latent impulses or obsessions. They do not indulge in external or internal phenomena. They do not indulge in contaminated or uncontaminated phenomena. They do not indulge in conditioned or unconditioned phenomena. They do not indulge in physical forms. They do not indulge in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. They do not indulge in the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. {Ki.VIII: 75} They do not indulge in the perfections, any of the aspects of emptiness, or the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They do not indulge in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, or the extrasensory powers. They do not indulge in the meditative stabilities or the dhāraṇī gateways. [F.247.b] They do not indulge in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They do not indulge in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. It is in this way, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings realize the defining characteristic of phenomena, of which all phenomena partake.” [B69]

63.3 “Blessed Lord, what is the cultivation of the path on which the Blessed One depends, without resorting either to affliction or purification, and which does not lapse into cyclic existence with its five classes of living beings?”

- “Subhūti,” asked the Blessed One in return, “do you think there is any such entity dependent on which an emanation of the tathāgatas will resort either to affliction or to purification, and which will appear within cyclic existence with its five classes of living beings?”
- 63.4 “No, Blessed Lord! There is no such entity dependent on which an emanation of the tathāgatas will resort either to affliction or to purification, and which will appear within cyclic existence with its five classes of living beings.”
- 63.5 “It is in this manner, Subhūti,” said the Blessed One, “that bodhisattva great beings realize the principle of phenomena, of which all phenomena partake.”
- 63.6 “Blessed Lord, are all physical forms like a phantom emanation? Are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness like a phantom emanation?” [F.248.a]
- “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “all physical forms are like a phantom emanation. All feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are like a phantom emanation.”
- 63.7 “Blessed Lord, if all physical forms are like a phantom emanation, and all feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are like a phantom emanation, how then do bodhisattva great beings act effectively when phantom emanations are without physical forms; without feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; and without either affliction or purification, so that they are without cyclic existence with its five classes of living beings?”
- 63.8 “Subhūti,” asked the Blessed One in return, “when bodhisattva great beings engage in the conduct of a bodhisattva, do you think that {Ki.VIII: 76} they apprehend any being whom they should liberate from the hell realms, the animal realm, the world of Yama, or from among the gods and human beings?”
- “No, Blessed Lord!”
- 63.9 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” continued the Blessed One. “Bodhisattva great beings do not apprehend any being at all whom they should liberate from the three realms. If you ask why, it is because they have known, seen, and realized that all phenomena are like a magical display. They have known, seen, and realized that they are like a phantom emanation.”
- 63.10 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings have known, seen, and realized that all phenomena are like a magical display, and known, seen, and realized that they are like a phantom emanation, for what purpose do bodhisattva great beings [F.248.b] practice the six perfections? For what purpose do they practice the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the five extrasensory powers, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, and [the fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? Why do bodhisattva great beings practice [the paths], up to and including the path of enlightenment? Why do they refine the buddhafi elds and bring beings to maturation?"

63.11 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "if beings of their own accord had known that all phenomena are like a phantom emanation, then bodhisattva great beings would not indeed have engaged in the conduct of a bodhisattva over countless eons for the sake of beings. Subhūti, it is because beings do not know of their own accord that all phenomena are like a phantom emanation that bodhisattva great beings do engage in the six perfections for their sake over countless eons, and they continue to bring beings to maturation, and also refine the buddhafi elds."

63.12 Subhūti then asked, "Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are like a dream, like an echo, like a mirage, like an optical aberration, like a magical display, and like a phantom emanation, what is it, Blessed Lord, on which beings are fixed, and for which bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and cause beings to escape?"

63.13 "Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "it is because beings are fixed on determining through inauthentic names and signs that bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and cause beings to escape from those names and signs." [F.249.a]

63.14 "Blessed Lord, what are names and what are signs?"

"Subhūti," replied the Blessed One, "'names' and 'signs' are adventitious superimpositions by [mere] words. That is to say, such designations, including 'names,' 'signs,' 'physical forms,' 'feelings,' 'perceptions,' 'formative predispositions,' 'consciousness,' 'women,' 'men,' {Ki.VIII: 77} 'boys,' 'girls,' 'denizens of the hells,' 'the animal realm,' 'the world of Yama,' 'gods,' 'human beings,' 'conditioned phenomena,' 'unconditioned phenomena,' 'the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa,' 'the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth,' 'the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth,' 'arhatship,' 'individual enlightenment,' and 'complete enlightenment' have been superimposed by [mere] words that are a magical display. Subhūti, all names have been designated by words and concepts. All conditioned phenomena to which ordinary people form attachments are mere names. When bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they encourage those [ordinary people] through skill in means, saying, 'All names have originated from imagination, and you should not be attached to imagined nonentities, which are empty of essential nature. The learned do not become fixated on any of these phenomena, which are empty.’ It is in this manner, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they teach the Dharma to beings through skill in means. [F.249.b]

63.15 “Subhūti, if you ask what are signs, the signs to which ordinary people become attached are of two sorts. If you ask what these two sorts are, they comprise signs that have form and signs without form. Subhūti, if you ask what are signs that have form, all momentary phenomena with gross or subtle form, positive or negative, far or near, belonging to the past, future, or present, which are grasped through imagination, are said to be signs that have form. Subhūti, if you ask what are signs without form, any formless phenomena whatsoever that are imagined by being grasped as signs and then give rise to afflicted mental states are said to be signs without form. Therefore, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they will through skill in means release beings from those signs and establish them, so that they come to rest, in the expanse of signlessness. By whatever means they should establish them, letting them come to rest in such a way that they do not fall into duality, thinking, ‘This is a sign’ or ‘That is signlessness.’ It is in this manner, Subhūti, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they will through skill in means release beings from those signs and establish them in the expanse of signlessness.”

63.16 “If all these phenomena are merely like that, which is to say, they are merely names and signs—mere imputations that originate from imagination—then when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they attain particular virtuous attributes, and how do they induce others to attain particular virtuous attributes, [F.250.a] and engage with them, perfecting the levels, from one to the next, by means of those virtuous attributes, and also induce beings to engage with the three vehicles?” {Ki.VIII:78}

63.17 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “if there were entities or some indication of an entity, in that case, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practiced the perfection of wisdom, they would not even attain distinction and they would not induce others to attain distinction. But, on the contrary, it is because there are no entities and no indication of any entity that, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do perfect the perfection of meditative concentration by way of signlessness, and they do perfect the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity by way of signlessness. They do perfect the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions by way of signlessness. They do perfect the four applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path by way of signlessness. They do perfect the emptiness of internal phenomena, the emptiness of external phenomena, and the emptiness of external and internal phenomena by way of signlessness. They do perfect [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, by way of signlessness. They do perfect the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.250.b] the four truths of the noble ones, and the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—by way of signlessness. They do perfect the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways by way of signlessness. They do perfect the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas by way of signlessness. And having perfected these virtuous attributes, they then cause others also to engage in these virtuous attributes by way of signlessness.

63.18 “Subhūti, if any sign were to exist, even as minutely small as a fraction of a hair-tip, then when bodhisattva great beings practiced the perfection of wisdom, they would not attain consummate buddhahood in which all phenomena are signless, free from recollection and free from attention, nor would they establish beings in uncontaminated phenomena, in the real nature. Subhūti, all uncontaminated phenomena are signless, free from recollection, and free from attention. Therefore, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they continue to act for the sake of all beings by means of uncontaminated phenomena.”

63.19 “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are signless, free from recollection, and free from attention, in that case, Blessed Lord, how are designations applied, such as, ‘These are virtuous attributes. These are nonvirtuous attributes. These are mundane attributes. These are supramundane attributes. These are contaminated attributes. [F.251.a] These are uncontaminated attributes. These are conditioned attributes. These are unconditioned attributes. These are common attributes. These are uncommon attributes. These are the attributes of śrāvakas. These are the attributes of pratyekabuddhas. These are the attributes of bodhisattvas. These are the attributes of buddhas?’”
{Ki.VIII: 79}

63.20 “Subhūti, do you think that signlessness is one thing and the attributes of the śrāvakas are another?” asked the Blessed One.

“No, Blessed Lord!”

63.21 “Subhūti, do you think that signlessness is one thing and the attributes of the pratyekabuddhas are another, that signlessness is one thing and that the attributes of the bodhisattvas are also another, and that signlessness is one thing and that the attributes of the buddhas are also another?” asked the Blessed One.

“No, Blessed Lord!”

63.22 “Well then, Subhūti,” the Blessed One asked further, “do the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, the attributes of the bodhisattvas, and the attributes of the buddhas constitute signlessness?”

“Yes, they do, Blessed Lord! Yes, they do, Sugata!”

63.23 “Those, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “are the formulations explaining how you should know that all phenomena are signlessness. Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who train in this signlessness of all phenomena are enhanced by many virtuous attributes. That is to say, they are enhanced by the six perfections, the emptiness of internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities, [F.251.b] the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the five extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, all the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and all the inestimable attributes of the buddhas apart from these.

63.24 “If you ask why, it is because bodhisattva great beings should train in emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness, but not train in anything except these. If you ask why, all virtuous attributes are gathered in these three gateways to liberation. Emptiness as a gateway to liberation implies that phenomena are empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. Signlessness as a gateway to liberation implies that they are without signs. Wishlessness as a gateway to liberation implies that they are without conditioning. Bodhisattva great beings who train in these three gateways to liberation do train in the five aggregates. They train in the twelve sense fields. They train in the eighteen sensory elements. They train in the twelve links of dependent origination. They train in the six perfections. They train in the emptiness of internal phenomena. They train in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities. {Ki.VIII: 80} [F.252.a] They train in the four applications of mindfulness. They train in the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They train in the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways. They train in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They train in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.”

63.25 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they train in that [aforementioned] manner in the five aggregates of appropriation?”

63.26 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they correctly discern physical forms. They correctly discern how physical forms arise, how physical forms cease, and what is the real nature of physical forms. If you ask how they discern physical forms, they discern physical forms just as they correctly discern an essenceless mass of foam to be utterly fallacious,⁵⁴⁸ utterly porous, and utterly essenceless.

63.27 “If you ask how they discern the arising and perishing of physical forms, [F.252.b] inasmuch as physical forms have neither come from anywhere, nor gone anywhere, and will neither come from anywhere nor go anywhere, they discern that there is nothing at all from which they have come and nowhere at all that they go. It is in this way that they discern the arising and perishing of physical forms. If you ask how they discern the real nature of physical forms, it is the case that the real nature of physical forms neither arises nor ceases, neither comes nor goes, is neither afflicted nor purified, and is neither diminished nor enhanced. That is to say, phenomena dwell without error in the real nature. This is why it is termed the real nature. It is in this manner that they discern the real nature of physical forms.

63.28 “If you ask how they discern feelings, they discern feelings just as a vacuous bubble of water is discerned to arise and cease. If you ask how they discern the arising and perishing of feelings, inasmuch as feelings have neither come from anywhere, nor gone anywhere, and will neither come from anywhere nor go anywhere, they discern that there is nothing at all from which they have come and nowhere at all that they go. It is in this way that they discern the arising and perishing of feelings. If you ask how they discern the real nature of feelings, it is the case that the real nature of feelings neither arises nor ceases, neither comes nor goes, is neither afflicted nor purified, and is neither diminished nor enhanced. That is to say, phenomena dwell without error in the real nature. This is why it is termed the real nature. It is in this manner that they discern the real nature of feelings.

63.29 “If you ask how they discern perceptions, they discern perceptions in the same way that the water in a mirage is known to be nonapprehensible. If you ask how they discern the arising and perishing of perceptions, [F.253.a] inasmuch as perceptions have neither come from anywhere, nor gone anywhere, and will neither come from anywhere nor go anywhere, they discern that there is nothing at all from which they have come and nowhere at all that they go. It is in this way that they discern the arising and perishing of perceptions. {Ki.VIII: 81} If you ask how they discern the real nature of perceptions, it is the case that the real nature of perceptions neither arises nor ceases, neither comes nor goes, is neither afflicted nor purified, and is neither diminished nor enhanced. That is to say, phenomena dwell without error in the real nature. This is why it is termed the real nature. It is in this manner that they discern the real nature of perceptions.

63.30 “If you ask how they discern formative predispositions, they discern formative predispositions in the same way that the core of a plantain tree is known to be absolutely nonapprehensible when the outer layers are peeled away. If you ask how they discern the arising and perishing of formative predispositions, inasmuch as formative predispositions have neither come from anywhere, nor gone anywhere, and will neither come from anywhere nor go anywhere, they discern that there is nothing at all from which they have come and nowhere at all that they go. It is in this way that they discern the arising and perishing of formative predispositions. If you ask how they discern the real nature of formative predispositions, it is the case that the real nature of formative predispositions neither arises nor ceases, neither comes nor goes, is neither afflicted nor purified, and is neither diminished nor enhanced. That is to say, phenomena dwell without error in the real nature. This is why it is termed the real nature. It is in this manner that they discern the real nature of formative predispositions.

63.31 “If you ask how they discern consciousness, they discern consciousness in the same way that the four corps of an army conjured by an illusionist are discerned. If you ask how they discern the arising and perishing of consciousness, inasmuch as consciousness [F.253.b] has neither come from anywhere, nor gone anywhere, and will neither come from anywhere nor go anywhere, they discern that there is nothing at all from which it has come and nowhere at all that it goes. It is in this way that they discern the arising and perishing of consciousness. If you ask how they discern the real nature of consciousness, it is the case that the real nature of consciousness neither arises nor ceases, neither comes nor goes, is neither afflicted nor purified, and is neither diminished nor enhanced. That is to say, phenomena dwell without error in the real nature. This is why it is termed the real nature. It is in this manner that they discern the real nature of consciousness.

63.32 “If you ask how they discern the sense fields, they discern internal phenomena to be empty of internal phenomena and they discern external phenomena to be empty of external phenomena. It is in this manner that they discern the sense fields.

63.33 “If you ask how they discern the sensory elements, they discern that the sensory element of the eyes is empty of the essential nature of the sensory element of the eyes, that the sensory element of sights is empty of the essential nature of the sensory element of sights, and that the sensory element of visual consciousness is empty of the essential nature of the sensory element of visual consciousness. [They discern that] the sensory elements of the ear, nose, tongue, body, and mental faculty are also empty of the essential nature of the sensory element of the mental faculty [and those other internal sensory elements]; that the [external sensory elements, up to and including] the sensory element of mental phenomena, are empty of the essential nature of the sensory element of mental phenomena [and those other external sensory elements]; and that [the sensory elements of consciousness, up to and including] the sensory element of mental consciousness, are empty of the essential nature of the sensory element of mental consciousness [and those other sensory elements of consciousness]. It is in this manner that they discern the sensory elements. {Ki.VIII: 82}

63.34 “If you ask how they discern the links of dependent origination, they discern that the links of dependent origination do not arise, and they similarly discern that the links of dependent origination do not cease; that they are neither extinguished nor permanent; that they are neither confined to a single meaning, nor are their meanings manifold; that they neither come nor go; and that they are free from conceptual elaboration, and at peace. It is in this manner that [F.254.a] they discern the links of dependent origination.

63.35 “If you ask how they discern the truths of the noble ones, they discern the noble truth of suffering, and they discern the truths of the noble ones of the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path that leads to cessation. If you ask how they discern the truth of suffering, they discern suffering, they discern the truth, and they discern the truth of the noble ones. They discern the noble truth that is liberated from duality—that is to say, the truth of the noble ones is nondualistic.⁵⁴⁹ Similarly, they discern the truths of the noble ones of the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path that leads to cessation. It is in this manner that they discern the truths of the noble ones. If you ask how they discern the real nature of the truths of the noble ones, they discern that the real nature of suffering is unerring. Similarly, they also correctly discern the real nature of the origin of suffering, the cessation of suffering, and the path that leads to cessation. It is in this manner that they discern the real nature of the truths of the noble ones.”

63.36 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they were to investigate phenomena that are so different from one another in this manner, would the realm of phenomena not be disrupted?”

63.37 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the realm of phenomena would be disrupted if there were any extraneous phenomena existing apart from it, but, Subhūti, nothing at all is apprehended apart from the realm of phenomena. If any such thing were apprehended, the realm of phenomena would indeed be disrupted. If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because there is nothing that the tathāgatas, bodhisattvas, pratyekabuddhas, [F.254.b] and the śrāvakas of the tathāgatas apprehend outside the realm of phenomena. Since there is nothing to apprehend, there is nothing conceived that is outside the realm of phenomena. It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should train in the realm of phenomena.”

63.38 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, in what will bodhisattva great beings who train in the realm of phenomena become trained?” {Ki.VIII: 83}

“Subhūti,” bodhisattva great beings who engage in the realm of phenomena will become trained in all phenomena,” replied the Blessed One. “If you ask why, Subhūti, it is because all phenomena constitute the realm of phenomena.”

63.39 “Blessed Lord, why do all phenomena constitute the realm of phenomena?”

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “whether the tathāgatas have appeared or whether they have not appeared, the realm of phenomena, of which all phenomena partake, itself dwells indivisibly. Subhūti, the realm of phenomena indeed comprises all phenomena—attributes that are virtuous and nonvirtuous; attributes that are mundane and supramundane, contaminated and uncontaminated; attributes that are inadmissible and admissible; and attributes that are conditioned and unconditioned. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom become trained in all phenomena by training in the realm of phenomena.”

63.40 “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena constitute the realm of phenomena, in that case, how should bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom train in physical forms? How should they train in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness? [F.255.a] How should they train in the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination? How should they train in the perfection of generosity? How should they train in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom? How should they train in the emptiness of internal phenomena? How should they train in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity? How should they train in the four applications of mindfulness? How should they train in the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path? How should they train in the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the six extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways? How should they train in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, great equanimity, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? How should they train in actualizing the thirty-two major marks of a great person, and the eighty excellent minor marks?

63.41 “How should they train to achieve rebirth among great and lofty royal families? How should they train to achieve rebirth among great and lofty priestly families, or among great and lofty householder families? How should they train to be reborn in the god realm of Caturmahārājakāyika? [F.255.b] How should they train to be reborn in the god realms of Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Brahmakāyika, Brahmapurohita, Brahmapariśadya, Mahābrahmā, Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parīttāśubha, Apramāṇāśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, {Ki.VIII: 84} Bṛhat, Parīttabṛhat, Apramāṇabṛhat, or Bṛhatphala? How should they train to be reborn in the realms of nonperceptual beings? How should they train to be reborn among the gods of the Pure Abodes—[Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, and Akaniṣṭha]—and also how should they avoid being reborn in them? How should they train to be reborn in the god realm of the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, and also how should they avoid being reborn in them?

63.42 “How should they train in the first setting of their mind on enlightenment? How should they train in the second, the third, the fourth, the fifth, the sixth, the seventh, the eighth, the ninth, and the tenth setting of their mind on enlightenment? How should they train in the level of the śrāvakas and the level of the pratyekabuddhas? How should they train in the maturity of the bodhisattvas, the maturation of beings, and the refinement of the buddhafi elds? How should they train in the path of enlightenment whereby those who have trained in it investigate all phenomena in all their aspects?

63.43 “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom should train in physical forms; should train in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; should train in the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination; should train in the perfection of generosity; [F.256.a] should train in the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom; should train in the emptiness of internal phenomena; should train in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity; should train in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; should train in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; should train in the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; should train in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, and the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth; should train in arhatship and individual enlightenment; and should train in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, one might wonder, Blessed Lord, why bodhisattva great beings do not resort to erroneous practices nor elaborate unpleasant thoughts?

63.44 “If one were to wonder why, Blessed Lord, it is because these false imaginations do not exist in this realm of phenomena. Physical forms do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from physical forms. Physical forms simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, [F.256.b] formative predispositions, and consciousness do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from consciousness [and so forth]. Consciousness [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is consciousness [and so forth]. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The links of dependent origination [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. The factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. The dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. The distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, [F.257.a] and the realm of phenomena simply is the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from individual enlightenment [and so forth]. Individual enlightenment [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is individual enlightenment [and so forth]. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, do not constitute the realm of phenomena, nor does the realm of phenomena exist apart from all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. All-aspect omniscience [and so forth] simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].”

63.45 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is just as you have said. All these false imaginations do not exist in the realm of phenomena. Physical forms simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is consciousness [and so forth]. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. [F.257.b] The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is individual enlightenment [and so forth]. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, simply are the realm of phenomena, and the realm of phenomena simply is all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].

63.46 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they were to see anything apart from the realm of phenomena, then they would not be intent on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. All phenomena are the realm of phenomena. This is why, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they know all phenomena to be the realm of phenomena, {Ki.VIII: 85} and can then teach the Dharma by attributing to all those nameless phenomena the symbolic convention of names, as follows: ‘These are physical forms.’ ‘These are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness.’ ‘These are the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination.’ ‘These are the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment.’ ‘These are the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, [F.258.a] wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways.’ ‘These are the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas.’ ‘These are [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’

63.47 “Subhūti, this is just as if an illusionist or the skilled apprentice of an illusionist, based on some material form, were to conjure a diversity of other forms, including the form of an elephant, the form of a horse, the form of a bull, the form of a camel, the form of a sheep, the form of a man, the form of a woman, or the form of a boy or girl, or a meadow, a palace, a forest of austere practitioners, or a pleasant monastic garden, or a pleasant pool, or a pleasant grove—and if in those same places he were then to lay out a diversity of mats with seats and places for the assembly, and even exhibit flowers, garlands, incense, unguents, food, and other such exquisite spectacles; and if he were to delight the crowd with songs and music, or delight the crowd by dispensing generosity, keeping [the vows of] ethical discipline, cultivating tolerance, undertaking perseverance, playing with meditative concentration, cultivating wisdom, or any such means—and even if [through these illusions], he were to exhibit great and lofty royal families, great and lofty priestly families, or great and lofty householder families; or exhibit Mount Sumeru; or exhibit the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm; or exhibit the gods of Trayāstrimśa, Yāma, [F.258.b] Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, Paranirmitavaśavartin, Brahmakāyika, Brahmapurohita, Brahmapariśadya, Mahābrahmā, Ābha, Parīttābha, Apramāṇābha, Ābhāsvara, Śubha, Parīttaśubha, Apramāṇaśubha, Śubhakṛtsna, Bṛhat, Parīttabṛhat, Apramāṇabṛhat, Bṛhatphala, Avṛha, Atapa, Sudṛśa, Sudarśana, and Akaniṣṭha; or exhibit the formless gods of the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, or the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception; or exhibit many entering the stream to nirvāṇa, destined for only one more rebirth, no longer subject to rebirth, arhats, or pratyekabuddhas—or else if he were to exhibit bodhisattva great beings, starting from those who have first set their minds on enlightenment; those practicing the perfection of generosity; those practicing the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, {Ki.VIII: 86} and the perfection of wisdom; those practicing all the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities, and the formless absorptions; those perfecting the first bodhisattva level, and those perfecting [the other bodhisattva levels], up to and including the tenth level; those actualizing the maturity of the bodhisattvas and the extrasensory powers, playing with those extrasensory powers, illuminating the world systems, bringing beings to maturation, refining the buddhafi elds, sacrificing limbs and appendages, [F.259.a] practicing austerities, consummating the powers of the tathāgatas, and consummating the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas; or those actualizing great compassion, or even exhibiting the body of a buddha, with all limbs and appendages completely perfect, those spectators—beings who have the way of being of ordinary people—would think with great astonishment, ‘Oh! What forms of astonishing beauty does this well-trained man create! He delights the crowd and exhibits a diversity of forms—from the form of an elephant and the form of a horse, up to and including the form of a buddha with all limbs and appendages completely perfect!’

63.48 “Then, there might be some wise and lucid men, sharp-witted and endowed with superior analytical ability, who would think, ‘Since nothing at all can be apprehended in this [illusory act], it is a wonderful and marvelous phenomenon that this man delights this crowd of people with nonexistent phenomena.’ For they know that these beings are perceiving nonentities as entities.

63.49 “In the same way, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not see anything at all outside the realm of phenomena. Through skill in means, although they bring beings to maturation, they do not apprehend beings. They do not apprehend anything that is conceived of as a being. They themselves dispense generosity and they also encourage others to practice generosity. They speak in praise of generosity, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings dispensing generosity. They themselves maintain ethical discipline, [F.259.b] and they also encourage others to maintain ethical discipline. They speak in praise of ethical discipline, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings maintaining ethical discipline. They themselves cultivate tolerance, and they also encourage others to cultivate tolerance. They speak in praise of tolerance, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating tolerance. They themselves undertake perseverance, and they also encourage others to undertake perseverance. They speak in praise of perseverance, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings undertaking perseverance. They themselves are absorbed in meditative stability, and they also encourage others to engage in meditative stability. They speak in praise of meditative stability, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in meditative stability. {Ki.VIII: 87} They themselves cultivate wisdom, and they also encourage others to cultivate wisdom. They speak in praise of wisdom, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating wisdom. [B70]

63.50 “They themselves maintain the paths of the ten virtuous actions and they also encourage others toward the paths of the ten virtuous actions. They speak in praise of the paths of the ten virtuous actions, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings maintaining the paths of the ten virtuous actions. They themselves attend the eightfold observance and they also encourage others [to attend] the eightfold observance. [F.260.a] They speak in praise of the eightfold observance, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings attending the eightfold observance. They themselves maintain the five precepts and they also encourage others toward the five precepts. They speak in praise of the five precepts, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings maintaining the five precepts.

63.51 “They themselves are absorbed in the first meditative concentration and they also encourage other beings toward the first meditative concentration. They speak in praise of the first meditative concentration, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in the first meditative concentration. They themselves are absorbed in the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration, and they also encourage others toward the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. They speak in praise of the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth], and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. They themselves are absorbed in loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity, and they also encourage others toward equanimity [and so forth]. They speak in praise of equanimity [and so forth], and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in equanimity [and so forth]. They themselves are absorbed in the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, [F.260.b] the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, and they also encourage others toward the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception [and so forth]. They speak in praise of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception [and so forth], and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings being absorbed in the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception [and so forth].

- 63.52 “They themselves cultivate the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment and they also encourage other beings toward the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They speak in praise of the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment.
- 63.53 “They themselves cultivate the three gateways of liberation, {Ki.VIII: 88} the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the five extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, and they also encourage other beings toward the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They speak in praise of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth].
- 63.54 “They themselves cultivate the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and they also encourage other beings toward the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They speak in praise of the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings cultivating the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth].
- 63.55 “They themselves actualize the thirty-two major marks of a great person [F.261.a] and the eighty excellent minor marks, and they also encourage other beings toward [actualizing] the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks. They speak in praise of the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks, and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in other beings actualizing the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks.
- 63.56 “Subhūti, if the realm of phenomena were not in the future exactly the same as it was in the past, and if it were not exactly the same in the interim [that is to say, the present], then, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they would not reveal the realm of phenomena to beings through their skill in means, they would not bring beings to maturation, and they would not refine the buddhafiels. Subhūti, it is because the realm of phenomena will be in the future exactly the same as it was in the past, and is exactly the same in the interim, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do reveal the realm of phenomena to beings through their skill in means, they do engage in the conduct of a bodhisattva for the sake of beings, they do bring beings to maturation, and they do refine the buddhafiels.”

63.57 This completes the sixty-third chapter, "The Teaching on Sameness," from "The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines."

CHAPTER 64

- 64.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if beings are absolutely not apprehended and indeed not apprehensible as beings, for whose sake do bodhisattva great beings cultivate the perfection of wisdom?” {Ki.VIII: 89} [F.261.b]
- 64.2 The Blessed One replied to the venerable Subhūti, “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings cultivate the perfection of wisdom, having taken the very limit of reality as their standard. Subhūti, if the very limit of reality were one thing and the very limit of beings another, bodhisattva great beings would indeed not cultivate the perfection of wisdom. Subhūti, it is because the very limit of reality is not one thing and the very limit of beings another that bodhisattva great beings do indeed cultivate the perfection of wisdom for the sake of beings. That is to say, bodhisattva great beings who cultivate the perfection of wisdom establish beings in the very limit of reality without disturbing the very limit of reality.”
- 64.3 “Blessed Lord, if the very limit of reality is not one thing and the very limit of beings not another, can the very limit of reality be established in the very limit of reality? Blessed Lord, if the very limit of reality could be established in the very limit of reality, then the essential nature would be established in the essential nature. Blessed Lord, since the essential nature cannot be established in the essential nature, how then, Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, do they establish beings in the very limit of reality?”
- 64.4 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “the very limit of reality is indeed not established in the very limit of reality. Nor is the essential nature established in the essential nature. And yet, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, [F.262.a] through skill in means they do establish the very limit of beings in the very limit of reality, and they do not disturb the very limit of reality. If you ask why, the very limit of beings is not one thing and the very limit of reality another. So, the very limit of beings and the very limit of reality are indivisible and cannot be divided in two.”

64.5 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, what is the skill in means endowed with which they establish beings in the very limit of reality but do not disturb the very limit of reality?”

64.6 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, commencing from their first setting of the mind on enlightenment, they establish beings in generosity. Having established them in generosity, they reveal that, ‘Generosity is empty in the beginning, in the end, and in the middle, and just as that generosity is empty in the beginning, empty in the end, and empty in the middle, so too is the fruit of that generosity empty; the donor is also empty and the recipient is also empty. {Ki.VIII: 90} So it is, noble children, that these concepts are not discerned in the very limit of reality. Do not think that generosity is one thing and the fruit of generosity another! Do not think that the donor is one thing and the recipient another. Noble children, when you do not think that generosity is one thing and the fruit of generosity another, and when you do not think that the donor is one thing and the recipient another, this generosity of yours will become [deathless] nectar, the fruit of [deathless] nectar, and it will terminate in [deathless] nectar. But through this generosity, you should not appropriate physical forms! [F.262.b] Do not appropriate feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness! If you ask why, it is because this generosity of yours is empty of generosity, its fruit is also empty of its fruit, the donor is also empty of the donor, and the recipient is also empty of the recipient. In emptiness, generosity is not apprehended, nor are the fruit of generosity, the donor, or the recipient apprehended. If you ask why, it is because these phenomena are said to be absolutely empty of inherent existence.’

64.7 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they establish beings in ethical discipline through skill in means, saying, ‘Come here, noble children. As well as abstaining from the killing of living creatures, remove yourselves from the killing of living creatures. As well as abstaining from stealing, sexual misconduct, falsehood, slander, verbal abuse, nonsensical chatter, covetousness, malice, and wrong views, remove yourselves from wrong views [and so forth]. Noble children, since no inherent existence is discerned with respect to these phenomena, such as you have imagined, noble children, you should reflect on and disclose [to others] what are the living creatures whose life is to be killed, or the sorts of things by which they are to be killed; what are stealing, sexual misconduct, falsehood, slander, hard words, nonsensical chatter, covetousness, malice, and wrong views; what is designated as wrong views [and so forth]; by what are wrong views [and so forth] designated; and who is it who has wrong views [and so forth], and then you should establish them in ethical discipline.'

64.8 "Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, endowed with such skill in means [F.263.a] they bring beings to maturation, and they reveal to them generosity and the fruit of ethical discipline. That is to say, by revealing that the fruit of generosity and the fruit of ethical discipline are also empty of inherent existence, those noble children come to know that generosity, [ethical discipline], and the fruit of [generosity and] ethical discipline are empty of inherent existence, {Ki.VIII: 91} and they are not fixated upon them. Since they are without fixation, they will not be disturbed, and they will develop wisdom. Through that wisdom they sever all latent impulses and obsessions and attain final nirvāṇa in the expanse of nirvāṇa where there is no residue of the aggregates. That [result, however,] accords with mundane convention but not with ultimate reality. If you ask why, in emptiness nothing at all is apprehended that would attain final nirvāṇa or has attained final nirvāṇa. That which is termed their nirvāṇa is actually the emptiness of the unlimited.

64.9 "Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they see beings who are disturbed with thoughts of malice toward one another, they should instruct and advise them as follows: 'Noble children, practice tolerance! Cultivate tolerance! Maintain a disposition of serenity, peace, and clarity! One who inflicts harm, the means through which harm is inflicted, and the victim who is harmed—all these are indeed empty of inherent existence. Therefore, noble children, consider who is inflicting harm, on whom is harm being inflicted, and through what means is harm being inflicted. All these are empty of inherent existence. It is never the case that the emptiness of inherent existence not empty! It has not been created by the tathāgatas. It has not been created by the bodhisattvas, [F.263.b] the pratyekabuddhas, or the śrāvakas. It has not been created by gods, nāgas, yakṣas, gandharvas, asuras, garuḍas, kinnaras, or mahoragas. It has not been created by the gods of the Caturmahārājakāyika realm, and it has not been created by the gods of Trayastriṃśa, Yāma, Tuṣita, Nirmāṇarata, or Paranirmitavaśavartin; the Brahmā realms; Śubhakarṣṇa; the Pure Abodes; or the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, or the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. It is always empty of inherent existence. That which is empty of inherent existence does not inflict harm on anyone.' It is in this manner, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom and establish beings through skill in means in the emptiness of inherent existence—in the emptiness of inherent existence that applies to both causes and fruits. Gradually they reveal to them unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and encourage them, praise them, rejoice with them, settle them, discipline them, and establish them in it. That, however, accords with mundane convention {Ki.VIII: 92} and not with ultimate reality. If you ask why, in emptiness there is no one who attains, nothing by which attainment is brought about, and nothing at all that is attained. This, Subhūti, is the very limit of reality, the emptiness [of inherent existence]. Abiding in it, bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom for the sake of beings, but in it beings are not apprehended, nor is the concept ‘being’ apprehended. If you ask why, it is because [F.264.a] all phenomena are void of beings.

64.10 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they see beings who are indolent and feeble in perseverance, they should encourage them through skill in means to adopt physical and mental perseverance, saying, ‘Noble children, in the emptiness of inherent existence there is nothing at all that becomes discouraged or indolent, and nothing at all with respect to which one becomes discouraged or indolent. All these phenomena do not go beyond the emptiness of inherent existence. So, cultivate physical and mental perseverance and reject indolence! Persevere in virtuous actions—whether in generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom, the emptiness of internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity, the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas! Noble children, [F.264.b] you should realize that all these phenomena are unobscured owing to emptiness. There should be no discouragement at all with respect to phenomena that are unobscured.’ Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they reveal to beings the emptiness of inherent existence, and encourage them, praise them, rejoice with them, settle them, discipline them, and establish them in it. In every way they establish them so that they do not dwell in duality. If you ask why, the emptiness of inherent existence is indivisible and cannot be divided in two. Phenomena that are without duality do not dwell in anything at all.

64.11 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, through skill in means they should instruct and advise beings to persevere with the emptiness of inherent existence, saying, ‘Come here, noble children! You should undertake perseverance, whether in the context of generosity, ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, wisdom, the emptiness of internal phenomena, [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity, the applications of mindfulness, {Ki.VIII: 93} the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, the noble eightfold path, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, [F.265.a] the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. You should not, however, focus attention on them in terms of duality. If you ask why, these phenomena are empty of inherent existence. One should not focus attention on the emptiness of inherent existence in terms of duality, nor should one focus attention on it in terms of nonduality.’ Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they bring beings to maturation in the emptiness of inherent existence, and having brought them to maturation, they gradually establish them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment. They establish them in knowledge of the path and in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

64.12 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, through skill in means they should instruct and advise beings whose minds are distracted, saying, ‘Come here, noble children! Cultivate meditative stability! Do not entertain notions about distraction or notions about meditative stability! If you ask why, these phenomena are empty of inherent existence. In the emptiness of inherent existence nothing at all is apprehended that is distracted or one-pointed. Abiding in that meditative stability, if you engage in the emptiness of inherent existence, whatever virtuous attributes you engage in through body, speech, and mind, you will achieve them with little trouble, whether you dispense generosity, keep [the vows of] ethical discipline, practice tolerance, undertake perseverance, [F.265.b] develop meditative stability, or cultivate wisdom; engage in the emptiness of internal phenomena; engage in [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity; practice the applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, or the noble eightfold path; engage in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, or the meditative stabilities and the dhāraṇī gateways; engage in the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, great equanimity, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas; engage in the thirty-two major marks of a great person or in the eighty excellent minor marks; practice the path of the śrāvakas; practice the path of the pratyekabuddhas; practice the path of the bodhisattvas and the path of the buddhas; engage in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment; engage in all-aspect omniscience; engage in bringing beings to maturation; or engage in refining the buddhafiels.’ {Ki.VIII: 94}

- 64.13 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings [F.266.a] practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they act for the benefit of beings. Commencing from their first setting of the mind on enlightenment, they never again become ineffective, but explore all virtuous actions and act for the benefit of beings. At all times they continuously venerate the lord buddhas, and journey from buddhafiels to buddhafiels. They never again squander the Dharma that they have heard from those lord buddhas, even after transmigrating from this life, until they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. At all times they continuously acquire the dhāraṇīs and their physical faculties, verbal faculties, and mental faculties are undiminished. If you ask why, it is because at all times these bodhisattva great beings have continuously and absolutely cultivated all-aspect omniscience, so that, having absolutely cultivated all-aspect omniscience, they absolutely cultivate all paths. That is to say, they absolutely cultivate the path of the śrāvakas, the path of the pratyekabuddhas, the path of the bodhisattvas, and the path of the buddhas. Bodhisattva great beings absolutely cultivate the extrasensory powers that are also beneficial since they have not squandered them. Maintaining those extrasensory powers that originate from the maturation [of past actions], when they act for the benefit of beings, their all-aspect omniscience is never diminished even though they may roam in cyclic existence with its five realms of living beings. Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, they dwell in the emptiness of inherent existence, and, through skill in means, [F.266.b] they act for the benefit of beings.

64.14 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dwell in the emptiness of inherent existence, and if they see beings who are stupid and narrow-minded, they should instruct and advise them, saying, ‘Come here, noble children! Whatever actions you may do, whether of body, speech, or mind, you should understand that these are all the emptiness of inherent existence, and then all these actions of yours will become the fruit of [deathless] nectar and terminate in [deathless] nectar. In the emptiness of inherent existence there is nothing apprehensible at all, such that it could perish or degenerate. If you ask why, the emptiness of inherent existence will not degenerate, nor is there anything at all that can degenerate from the emptiness of inherent existence. If you ask why, it is because the emptiness of inherent existence is neither an entity nor is it a nonentity. What will degenerate when all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity?’

64.15 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, {Ki.VIII: 95} they should instruct and advise beings through skill in means. When they instruct and advise in that manner, they will never again be ineffective. They themselves adopt and maintain the paths of the ten virtuous actions and they also encourage others to [adopt] the paths of the ten virtuous actions. They themselves adopt and maintain the five precepts, and they also encourage others [to adopt] the five precepts. They themselves adopt and attend the eightfold observance, [F.267.a] and they also encourage others to attend the eightfold observance.

64.16 “They themselves are absorbed in the first meditative concentration and they also encourage other beings toward the first meditative concentration. They themselves are absorbed in the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration and they also encourage others toward the fourth meditative concentration [and so forth]. At all times they themselves continuously maintain loving kindness, and at all times they also continuously encourage others to cultivate loving kindness. At all times they themselves continuously maintain compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity, and at all times they also continuously encourage others to cultivate equanimity [and so forth]. They speak in praise of equanimity [and so forth], and they also speak in praise of and take empathetic delight in those other beings being absorbed in equanimity [and so forth]. They themselves are always absorbed in the absorption of the sphere of infinite space, the absorption of the sphere of infinite consciousness, the absorption of the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception, and they also encourage others toward the absorption of the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception [and so forth].

64.17 “They themselves cultivate the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment and they also encourage others [to cultivate] the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth].

64.18 “They themselves train in the three gateways of liberation, and they also encourage others [to train in] the three gateways of liberation. They themselves train in the truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, [F.267.b] the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, and they also encourage others [to train in] the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth].

64.19 “They themselves train in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, and they also encourage others [to train in] the ten powers of the tathāgatas. They themselves train in the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and they also encourage others [to train in] the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They themselves train in the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks and they also encourage others to [train in] the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks.

64.20 “They themselves develop knowledge of the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and without dwelling in it, they also establish others in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They themselves develop knowledge of the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and the fruit of arhatship, and without dwelling in them, they also establish others in the fruit of arhatship [and so forth]. They themselves develop the path of individual enlightenment, and without dwelling in it, they also establish others in individual enlightenment. They themselves develop the path of unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they also instruct, advise, settle, discipline, and establish others in that path. {Ki.VIII: 96}

64.21 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, commencing from their first setting of the mind on enlightenment, they dwell in the emptiness of inherent existence [F.268.a] and act for the benefit of beings. Never again are they ineffective.”

64.22 “Blessed Lord, if in that manner all phenomena are empty of inherent existence—and if in the emptiness of inherent existence beings are not apprehended, nor is anything at all apprehended, nor is any nonexistent apprehended—how then, Blessed Lord, do bodhisattva great beings embark on all-aspect omniscience?”

64.23 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “All phenomena are empty of inherent existence. In the emptiness of inherent existence beings are not apprehended, nor is anything apprehended, nor is any nonexistent apprehended. Subhūti, if all phenomena were not empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings would not dwell in the emptiness of inherent existence, and, even after attaining consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, they would not teach that all phenomena are empty of inherent existence.

64.24 “Subhūti, if you ask what are those phenomena that are empty of inherent existence, it is the case, Subhūti, that physical forms are empty of inherent existence. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are empty of inherent existence. The sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination are empty of inherent existence. The perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment are empty of inherent existence. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, [F.268.b] signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are empty of inherent existence. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, great equanimity, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of inherent existence. The thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks are empty of inherent existence. The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment are empty of inherent existence. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are empty of inherent existence.

64.25 “Therefore, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they teach the Dharma that the five aggregates are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the twelve sense fields are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the eighteen sensory elements are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the links of dependent origination are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that all the perfections are empty of inherent existence.

They teach the Dharma that all the aspects of emptiness are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, [F.269.a] the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the five extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, great empathetic joy, and great equanimity are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment are empty of inherent existence. They teach the Dharma that all-aspect omniscience and the abandoning of all the connecting propensities are empty of inherent existence.

64.26 “Subhūti, if the emptiness of internal phenomena were not empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings would indeed not teach the Dharma that all phenomena are empty of inherent existence. If the emptiness of external phenomena, the emptiness of both external and internal phenomena, the emptiness of emptiness, the emptiness of great extent, the emptiness of ultimate reality, the emptiness of conditioned phenomena, the emptiness of unconditioned phenomena, the emptiness of the unlimited, the emptiness of that which has neither beginning nor end, the emptiness of nonexclusion, the emptiness of inherent existence, the emptiness of all phenomena, [F.269.b] the emptiness of intrinsic defining characteristics, the emptiness of nonapprehensibility, the emptiness of nonentities, the emptiness of essential nature, and the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentities were not⁵⁵⁰ empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings would indeed not teach the Dharma that all phenomena are empty of inherent existence, and for that reason even the emptiness of inherent existence would collapse.

- 64.27 “However, the emptiness of inherent existence will neither collapse, nor will it endure eternally, nor will it go away in the future. If you ask why, it is because it does not dwell in any location, it does not dwell in any direction, it does not arise from anywhere, and it does not go anywhere. {Ki.VIII: 97} It is the abiding nature of all phenomena. In it there is nothing at all that is perceived to be enhanced or perceived to be diminished, and nothing that is perceived to arise, originate, cease, be afflicted, or be purified. It is the natural expression of all phenomena.
- 64.28 “Abiding in it, bodhisattva great beings engage in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and yet they do not see anything at all in which they would engage or not engage. All phenomena are not to be engaged and are nondwelling. This is the abiding nature of all phenomena. Therefore, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they see that all phenomena are empty of inherent existence, and they do not turn back from unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because they do not observe anything at all that is obscured thereby. That is to say, they observe⁵⁵¹ that all phenomena are without obscuration. This is because in the emptiness of inherent existence, [F.270.a] self is not apprehensible, and even the concept of self is not apprehensible. Sentient beings, life forms, living beings, life, living creatures, individual personalities, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, instigators of experience, petitioners, instigators, knowers, and viewers are also not apprehensible, and even the concept of viewers [and so forth] is not apprehensible.
- 64.29 “Physical forms are not apprehensible, and even the concept of physical forms is not apprehensible. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are not apprehensible, and even the concept of consciousness [and so forth] is not apprehensible. [The attributes], up to and including the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks, are not apprehensible, and even the concept of the eighty excellent minor marks [and so forth] is not apprehensible. If that is the case, how could they possibly be consumed with doubt concerning unsurpassed, complete enlightenment!
- 64.30 “Subhūti, if, for example, [the tathāgatas] were to teach the Dharma continuously for many hundred billion trillions of eons to monks, nuns, laymen, or laywomen emanated by the tathāgatas, do you think, Subhūti, that those phantom emanations could possibly have the good fortune to attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa? Could they have the good fortune to attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment? Could they have the good fortune to attain unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“No, Blessed Lord! And if one were to ask why, it is because these are not entities.”

64.31 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” continued the Blessed One. [F.270.b] “If all phenomena are nonentities, what beings should bodhisattva great beings establish in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? {Ki.VIII:98} On the other hand, living creatures ensnared by erroneous views may be settled, disciplined, and established in nonerroneous views, in which case those erroneous views are not actually erroneous because they have originated [merely] from the causal basis of false imaginations. The absence of false imaginations is nonerroneous. Where there are no erroneous views, there is no self, and there are no beings, no life forms, no living beings, no life, no living creatures, no individual personalities, no human beings, no people, no actors, no experiencers, no knowers, and no viewers. In it there are no physical forms, no feelings, no perceptions, no formative predispositions, and no consciousness. In it there are no sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. In it there are no perfections, aspects of emptiness, or factors conducive to enlightenment. In it there are no truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, or dhāraṇī gateways. In it there are no ten powers of the tathāgatas, four fearlessnesses, four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, [F.271.a] great compassion, or eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. In it there are no [goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience. That in which there are no physical forms, no feelings, no perceptions, no formative predispositions, no consciousness, no sense fields, no sensory elements, no links of dependent origination, no perfections, no aspects of emptiness, no factors conducive to enlightenment, and no [fruitful attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, is the emptiness of inherent existence. Abiding in it, bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, and while practicing the perfection of wisdom, they liberate erroneous beings from the notion that there are beings, they liberate them from the notion of form, they liberate them from the notion of formlessness, and they liberate them from [all else], up to and including the notion that all phenomena are contaminated.

64.32 “As for phenomena that are uncontaminated—comprising the factors conducive to enlightenment, the three gateways to liberation, the four truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, all the meditative stabilities, all the dhāraṇī gateways, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas—they too do not exist as such from the point of view of ultimate reality. For these unconditioned and nonarising nonentities, devoid of origination, constitute the emptiness of inherent existence. This is the enlightenment of the lord buddhas, wherein there is no self, no being, [F.271.b] no life form, no living being, no life, no living creature, no individual personality, no human being, no person, no actor, no experiencer, no knower, and no viewer. In it there are no physical forms, no feelings, no perceptions, no formative predispositions, and no consciousness; no sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination; no perfections, aspects of emptiness, or factors conducive to enlightenment; and no [fruition attributes or goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.

64.33 “Bodhisattva great beings do not set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment for the sake of any path other than comprehension of the emptiness of inherent existence. This emptiness of inherent existence is indeed the emptiness of inherent existence with respect to the past, the emptiness of inherent existence with respect to the future, and the emptiness of inherent existence with respect to the intervening present. It is never not empty of inherent existence. Therefore, bodhisattva great beings practice the perfections, which are the emptiness of inherent existence, {Ki.VIII: 99} and they practice the knowledge of the path in order to liberate those beings who have the notion that they are beings from the notion that there are beings. When they practice the knowledge of the path, they practice all paths, including the path of the śrāvakas, the path of the pratyekabuddhas, and the path of the bodhisattvas. When bodhisattva great beings have perfected all those paths, brought beings to maturity, and refined the buddhafiels, they are blessed with the formative predispositions conducive to longevity, and they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. When they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.272.a] the way to buddhahood, the emptiness of inherent existence, is not interrupted.

64.34 “As for the way to buddhahood followed by the lord buddhas, the way to buddhahood that all the lord buddhas who appeared in the past have followed is indeed the emptiness of inherent existence. The way to buddhahood that all the lord buddhas who will appear in the future will follow is also the emptiness of inherent existence. The way to buddhahood that all the lord buddhas follow who reside and are alive at the present time in the world systems of the ten directions is also the emptiness of inherent existence. Apart from the emptiness of inherent existence, there are no lord buddhas who will appear in the world. So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfections, which are the emptiness of inherent existence. Bodhisattva great beings who practice this will make irreversible progress toward all-aspect omniscience.”

64.35 Subhūti then said, “Blessed Lord, it is wonderful that bodhisattva great beings practice everything in that manner through the emptiness of inherent existence, and yet do not disrupt the emptiness of inherent existence [by holding] that physical forms are one distinct thing and the emptiness of inherent existence another; that feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are distinct thing and the emptiness of inherent existence another; that the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another; that the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment are distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another; that the truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, [F.272.b] aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, and dhāraṇī gateways are distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another; that the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another; and that [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another. {Ki.VIII: 100} Rather, they engage on the basis that physical forms are themselves the emptiness of inherent existence and the emptiness of inherent existence is also physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are themselves the emptiness of inherent existence and the emptiness of inherent existence is also consciousness [and so forth]. [The attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are themselves the emptiness of inherent existence and the emptiness of inherent existence is also all-aspect omniscience [and so forth].”

64.36 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is as you have said. Subhūti, if physical forms were one distinct thing and the emptiness of inherent existence another; and similarly, if feelings were one distinct thing, perceptions one distinct thing, formative predispositions one distinct thing, consciousness one distinct thing and the emptiness of inherent existence another; if all the aggregates, sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination were distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another; if the perfections were one distinct thing, the aspects of emptiness one distinct thing, and the factors conducive to enlightenment one distinct thing and the emptiness of inherent existence another; if the truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, [F.273.a] immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, ten powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas were distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another; and if [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, were distinct things and the emptiness of inherent existence another—that is to say, if physical forms were not empty of inherent existence—then bodhisattva great beings would indeed not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, it is because physical forms are empty of inherent existence that bodhisattva great beings have comprehended that physical forms are empty of inherent existence, and will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

64.37 “If feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness were not empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings would indeed not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, it is because consciousness [and so forth] are empty of inherent existence that bodhisattva great beings have comprehended that [consciousness and so forth] are empty of inherent existence, and will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

64.38 “Subhūti, if [the attributes and goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, were not empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings [F.273.b] would indeed not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, it is because all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are empty of inherent existence that bodhisattva great beings have comprehended that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth] are empty of inherent existence, and will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

64.39 “Subhūti, if unsurpassed, complete enlightenment were not empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings would indeed not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, it is because unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is empty of inherent existence that bodhisattva great beings have comprehended that unsurpassed, complete enlightenment is empty of inherent existence, and will subsequently attain all-aspect omniscience.

64.40 “Subhūti, in the emptiness of inherent existence, there is nothing at all that disintegrates, endures eternally, or departs. On the contrary, those in the worlds frequented by gods and the worlds frequented by Māra and Brahmā deludedly think, ‘These are physical forms. This is my physical form. I have physical form,’ and so on, [up to and including] ‘This is consciousness. This is my consciousness. I have consciousness.’ {Ki.VIII: 101} They are fixated on physical forms, and they are fixated on consciousness [and so forth]. They indulge in notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine,’ and become fixated upon notions of ‘I’ and ‘mine.’ Then they become fixated on and attached to external and internal entities. Having become fixated and attached in that manner, they will, within the sense fields where they are reborn, acquire physical forms, and they will acquire feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness. [F.274.a] They will not be liberated from rebirth, aging, ill health, death, sorrow, lamentation, suffering, discomfort, and agitation. They will not be released from cyclic existence, with its five classes of living beings. [B71]

64.41 “So it is that bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfections, which are the emptiness of inherent existence, do not disrupt physical forms, holding that they are either empty or not empty. They do not disrupt feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, holding that they are either empty or not empty. They do not disrupt the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination, holding that they are either empty or not empty. They do not disrupt the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment, holding that they are either empty or not empty. They do not disrupt the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways, holding that they are either empty or not empty. They do not disrupt the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas, holding that they are either empty or not empty. They do not disrupt [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, holding that they are either empty or not empty. [F.274.b]

64.42 “If you ask why, the emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt physical forms, asserting, ‘These are physical forms. This is the emptiness of physical forms.’ The emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, asserting, ‘These are consciousness [and so forth]. This is the emptiness of consciousness [and so forth].’ The emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination, asserting, ‘These are the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. This is the emptiness of the links of dependent origination [and so forth].’ The emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt the perfections, any aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment, asserting, ‘These are the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. This is the emptiness of the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth].’ The emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways, asserting, ‘These are the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. This is the emptiness of the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth].’ The emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas, asserting, ‘These are the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. This is the emptiness of the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth].’ The emptiness of inherent existence does not disrupt the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, [F.275.a] the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or [unsurpassed] enlightenment, asserting, ‘These are [unsurpassed] enlightenment [and so forth]. This is the emptiness of [unsurpassed] enlightenment [and so forth].’

64.43 “As an analogy, Subhūti, just as space does not disrupt space—the internal space element does not disrupt the external space element, and the external space element does not disrupt the internal space element—in the same way, Subhūti, physical forms do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt physical forms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt consciousness [and so forth]. The sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt the links of dependent origination [and so forth]. The perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth].

The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, and [F.275.b] the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. The fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment do not disrupt emptiness, nor does emptiness disrupt unsurpassed, complete enlightenment [and so forth]. If you ask why, it is because all these phenomena are without any inherent existence that might disturb one into thinking, ‘These are physical forms, and this is emptiness. These are feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness, and this is emptiness. These are [the attributes and goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and this is emptiness.’ ”

64.44 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are indivisible, why do bodhisattva great beings think, ‘Having set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, I should attain consummate buddhahood’? {Ki.VIII: 102} Blessed Lord, enlightenment is indivisible in terms of duality. Anyone engaging in duality cannot attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

64.45 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “Enlightenment is indivisible in terms of duality. There is no enlightenment for those who engage in duality. Subhūti, since enlightenment is without duality, the enlightenment of the bodhisattvas does not engage in dualistic concepts such as ‘This is enlightenment. This is a bodhisattva.’ [F.276.a] The enlightenment of the bodhisattvas does not engage in physical forms. It does not engage in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. It does not engage in the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination. It does not engage in the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment. It does not engage in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. It does not engage in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. If you ask why, enlightenment does not indulge in concepts of ‘I’ or ‘mine.’ That is to say, it does not indulge in concepts such as ‘I should engage in physical forms’; ‘This is my physical form’; ‘I should engage in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness’; ‘This is my consciousness

[and so forth]'; 'I should engage in the sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination'; 'These are my links of dependent origination [and so forth]'; 'I should engage in the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment'; 'These are my factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth]'; 'I should engage in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, [F.276.b] the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways'; 'These are my dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]'; 'I should engage in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas'; 'These are my eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]'; 'I should engage in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment'; or 'This is my unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.' The enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings does not engage in grasping and it does not engage in nongrasping."

64.46 Subhūti then asked, "Blessed Lord, if the enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings does not engage in grasping and does not engage in nongrasping, in what does the enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings engage?"

64.47 "Subhūti, do you think that the enlightenment emanated by the tathāgatas engages in anything at all—grasping or nongrasping?" asked the Blessed One in return.

"It does not, Blessed Lord!"

64.48 "Subhūti, do you think that the intelligence of an arhat who is dreaming engages in anything at all—grasping or nongrasping?" asked the Blessed One.

"It does not, Blessed Lord! Even in the case of arhats, since they do not lie down [to sleep], how could their intelligence while they are dreaming possibly engage in grasping or nongrasping!" [F.277.a]

64.49 "Subhūti," said the Blessed One, "in the same way, the enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings does not engage in either grasping or nongrasping."

64.50 "Blessed Lord, if the enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings does not engage in grasping or nongrasping; {Ki.VIII: 103} does not engage in physical forms; does not engage in feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness; does not engage in the sense fields, sensory elements, or links of dependent origination; does not engage in the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment; does not engage in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways; does not engage in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and does not engage in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, how then do bodhisattva great beings practice the six perfections, and how do they practice the fourteen aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the three gateways of liberation, the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities, all the [formless] absorptions, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, [F.277.b] and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas? How would they perfect the ten bodhisattva levels? How would they be established in the five extrasensory powers? How would they enter a bodhisattva's full maturity? How would they refine the buddhafiels? How would they bring beings to maturation? How would they actualize the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks, and how would they attain consummate buddhahood in all-aspect omniscience? Blessed Lord, they cannot attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment without having practiced the six perfections; without having practiced the fourteen aspects of emptiness; without having practiced the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; without having practiced the three gateways of liberation; without having practiced the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities, and all the [formless] absorptions; without having practiced the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and without having perfected the ten bodhisattva levels, without having been established in the five extrasensory powers, without having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, without having refined the buddhafiels, without having brought beings to maturation, and without having brought into being the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks."

64.51 "Subhūti, it is so! It is so," replied the Blessed One. "It is as you have said. They cannot attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment without having practiced the six perfections; without having practiced the fourteen aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the three gateways of liberation, the meditative concentrations, [F.278.a] the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities, all the [formless] absorptions, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; and without having perfected the ten bodhisattva levels, without having been established in the five extrasensory powers, without having entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, without having refined the buddhafiels, without having brought beings to maturation, and without having brought into being the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks.

64.52 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings will attain all-aspect omniscience when they have perfected their engagement in unimpaired reality⁵⁵² and the constant state of equanimity; when they have perfected the six perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, {Ki.VIII: 104} [the causal attributes] from the four applications of mindfulness up to and including the noble eightfold path, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities, all the [formless] absorptions, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, and the ten bodhisattva levels; and when they have been established in the five extrasensory powers, entered into the maturity of the bodhisattvas, refined the buddhafiels, brought beings to maturation, and brought into being the thirty-two major marks of a great person and the eighty excellent minor marks. [F.278.b]

64.53 “Indeed, Subhūti, it is when they have been established in the essential nature of physical forms; established in the essential nature of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness; and established in the essential nature [of all the attributes and goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, that bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. But that essential nature is at peace. That is to say, it causes nothing at all to be enhanced or diminished, to arise or cease, or to be afflicted, purified, attained, or realized.

64.54 “According to the reality that is conceived in mundane, conventional terms, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, but according to ultimate truth, there exists nothing at all such as physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, sense fields, sensory elements, links of dependent origination, perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, or [F.279.a] [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment—and there is no one at all that engages in enlightenment. All these are conceived according to mundane, conventional terms, but that is ultimately not the case. Consequently, bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, engage in enlightenment but do not apprehend those thoughts. They do not even apprehend beings, pratyekabuddhas, or bodhisattvas.

64.55 “Subhūti, do you think that at the time when you, Subhūti, acquired the faculties in order to abandon false views about perishable composites, or when you acquired the unobstructed meditative stabilities, or the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship, there were any dreams, thoughts, or fruits that you apprehended?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

64.56 “In that case, in what manner was it declared and prophesied that you, Subhūti, had attained arhatship?” asked the Blessed One.

“Blessed Lord, this was declared and prophesied according to mundane convention.” {Ki.VIII: 105}

64.57 “In the same way, Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “bodhisattvas are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. Physical forms, too, are conceived in mundane, conventional terms. Feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, and consciousness are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. The sense fields, sensory elements, and links of dependent origination are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. The perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. [F.279.b] The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. [The goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, are also conceived in mundane, conventional terms. Bodhisattva great beings do not apprehend anything at all that may be enhanced, diminished, benefited, or harmed. Commencing from the essential nature of phenomena, since even that essential nature of phenomena, of which all phenomena partake, is not apprehended, how could the initial setting of the mind on enlightenment possibly be apprehended? That would be impossible! How could [bodhisattvas], up to and including those of the tenth level, along with the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment possibly be apprehended? That would be impossible! How could the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways possibly be apprehended? That would be impossible! How could the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, [F.280.a] great loving kindness, great compassion and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas possibly be apprehended? That would be impossible! How could [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, possibly be apprehended? That would be impossible!

64.58 “So it is, Subhūti, that having engaged in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and then act for the benefit of beings.”

64.59 This completes the sixty-fourth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

CHAPTER 65

- 65.1 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, if bodhisattva great beings do not have the fortune to have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, even though they have perfected the path of enlightenment by practicing the six perfections; by practicing the fourteen aspects of emptiness and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; by practicing the three gateways of liberation, the meditative concentrations, the aspects of liberation, the meditative stabilities, all the [formless] absorptions, the truths of the noble ones, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and by practicing the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, Blessed Lord, how do those bodhisattva great beings attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”
- 65.2 “Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, [F.280.b] “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if through skill in means they practice the perfection of generosity but do so without apprehending gifts, donors, or recipients, and without engaging in anything else apart from these [three] attributes, {Ki.VIII: 106} at that time bodhisattva great beings acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.
- 65.3 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if through skill in means they practice the perfection of ethical discipline but do so without apprehending [the vows of] ethical discipline or those who maintain ethical discipline, and without engaging in anything else apart from these two attributes, at that time bodhisattva great beings acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

65.4 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they practice the perfection of tolerance but do so without apprehending tolerance or those who are tolerant, and without engaging in anything else apart from these two attributes, at that time bodhisattva great beings will acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

65.5 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings [F.281.a] practice the perfection of wisdom, if they practice the perfection of perseverance but do so without apprehending perseverance or those who undertake perseverance, and without engaging in anything else apart from these two attributes, at that time bodhisattva great beings will acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

65.6 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they practice the perfection of meditative concentration but do so without apprehending meditative concentration or those who meditate, and without engaging in anything else apart from these two attributes, at that time bodhisattva great beings will acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed complete enlightenment.

65.7 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they cultivate the perfection of wisdom but do so without apprehending wisdom or those who have wisdom, and without engaging in anything else apart from these two attributes, at that time bodhisattva great beings will acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

65.8 “Moreover, Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings [F.281.b] practice the perfection of wisdom, if they practice [the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, but do so without apprehending the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] or those who cultivate the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], and without engaging in anything else apart from these two attributes, at that time bodhisattva great beings will acquire the path of enlightenment. Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom in that manner, through skill in means they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

65.9 Then the venerable Śāradvatīputra asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, how do they persevere in the path of enlightenment?”

65.10 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “in this regard, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom through skill in means they neither associate with nor disassociate from physical forms. If you ask why, it is because physical forms have no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate. They neither associate with nor disassociate from feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness. If you ask why, it is because consciousness [and so forth] have no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate.

65.11 “They neither associate with nor disassociate from the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination. If you ask why, it is because the links of dependent origination [and so forth] have no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate.

65.12 “They neither associate with nor disassociate from the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, or the factors conducive to enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because the factors conducive to enlightenment [and so forth] have no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate. {Ki.VIII: 107} [F.282.a]

65.13 “They neither associate with nor disassociate from the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, or the dhāraṇī gateways. If you ask why, it is because the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth] have no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate.

65.14 “They neither associate with nor disassociate from the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, or the distinct qualities of the buddhas. If you ask why, it is because the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth] have no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate.”

65.15 “Blessed Lord, if there is no essential nature with which they could associate or from which they could disassociate, how do bodhisattva great beings actualize the perfection of wisdom, in which they should train? Without having trained in the perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings cannot attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”

65.16 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “It is as you have said. Without having trained in the perfection of wisdom, bodhisattva great beings cannot attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. But they do so through skill in means, not without skill in means. Śāradvatīputra, when bodhisattva great beings [F.282.b] practice the perfection of wisdom, if they were to apprehend the lack of essential nature with respect to anything, for that reason they would also grasp it. But, on the contrary, since they do not apprehend that, what could be grasped such that one could say, ‘These are physical forms. These are feelings. These are perceptions. These are formative predispositions. This is consciousness’? What could be grasped such that one could say, ‘These are the sense fields, the sensory elements, and the links of dependent origination. These are the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the factors conducive to enlightenment. These are the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. These are the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas. These are [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience’?

65.17 “Śāradvatīputra, the perfection of wisdom cannot be grasped. The perfection of meditative concentration, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of ethical discipline, and the perfection of generosity cannot be grasped. All the aspects of emptiness and the factors conducive to enlightenment cannot be grasped. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, [F.283.a] emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways cannot be grasped. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas cannot be grasped.

- 65.18 “Śāradvatīputra, this is a perfection that cannot be grasped. Such is the perfection of wisdom. Bodhisattva great beings should train in it. Bodhisattva great beings who train in it do not apprehend even the training, let alone the perfection of wisdom, let alone enlightenment, let alone the attributes of enlightenment, let alone the attributes of the buddhas, let alone the attributes of the pratyekabuddhas, let alone the attributes of the śrāvakas, let alone the attributes of ordinary persons. If you ask why, Śāradvatīputra, it is because the essential nature of anything at all is not discerned. When, in that manner, all phenomena have the essential nature of nonentity, what are the attributes of ordinary persons? What are those of one entering the stream to nirvāṇa? What are those of one destined for only one more rebirth, one no longer subject to rebirth, arhats, or pratyekabuddhas? What are those of bodhisattvas? What are those of tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas? If these individuals are not apprehensible, how could the attributes that describe an ordinary person, one entering the stream to nirvāṇa, one destined for only one more rebirth, one no longer subject to rebirth, an arhat, a pratyekabuddha, a bodhisattva, or a tathāgata, arhat, [F.283.b] completely awakened buddha possibly arise?”
- 65.19 “Blessed Lord, when all phenomena are nonentities, why is it apprehended that ‘this is an ordinary person,’ and so on, up to ‘this is a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha’?”
- 65.20 “Śāradvatīputra, does there exist, has there existed, or will there exist an entity of physical forms such as that on which ordinary people are fixated?” asked the Blessed One in return.
“No, Blessed Lord, except in erroneous views.”
- 65.21 “Śāradvatīputra, does there exist, has there existed, or will there exist an entity of feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness, such as those on which ordinary people are fixated?” asked the Blessed One.
“No, Blessed Lord, except in erroneous views.”
- 65.22 “Śāradvatīputra, does there exist, has there existed, or will there exist an entity of [the causal and fruitional attributes], up to and including the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, such as those on which ordinary people are fixated?” asked the Blessed One.
“No, Blessed Lord, except in erroneous views.”
- 65.23 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so. It is so,” continued the Blessed One. “It is through erroneous views that beings falsely imagine all phenomena that are nonentities. Therefore, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, through skill in means they see that all phenomena are nonentities and set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.”
{Ki.VIII: 109} [F.284.a]

65.24 “Blessed Lord, what is the skill in means through which bodhisattva great beings see that all phenomena are nonentities and set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment?”

“In this regard, Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not observe anything at all as an entity that would impede them; or as an entity that, having impeded them, would cause them to be discouraged; or that, having caused them to be discouraged, would cause them to be idle; or that, having caused them to be idle, would cause them to be exasperated; or that, having caused them to be exasperated, would cause them to be indolent.

65.25 “Śāradvatīputra, apart from the delusion of beings that is fixated on phenomena such as ‘aggregates,’ ‘sense fields,’ ‘sensory elements,’ or ‘links of dependent origination,’ all phenomena are nonentities. They are without life forms and devoid of life. They are of the essential nature of nonentity. They are empty of inherent existence. So it is that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they observe that all phenomena are of the essential nature of nonentity, empty of inherent existence, and empty of intrinsic defining characteristics. Conjuring up their body in the manner of an illusionist, they teach the Dharma to beings. To those beings who have become miserly, they speak of generosity. To those of poor ethical discipline, they converse on ethical discipline. To beings with malice, they speak of tolerance. [F.284.b] To those who are indolent, they speak of perseverance. To those of distracted mind, they speak of meditative stability. To those of stupidity, they speak of wisdom. And once those beings have been established in generosity, and established in ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative stability, and wisdom, they speak to them about sublime matters, through which they will attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, they will attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, they will attain the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, they will attain arhatship, they will attain individual enlightenment, and they will attain all-aspect omniscience.”

65.26 “Blessed Lord, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, if they converse with beings who are nonexistent and not discernible, engaging them in generosity and engaging them in ethical discipline, tolerance, perseverance, meditative stability, and wisdom, and, over and above that, converse with them on sublime matters through which they will attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, attain the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, or individual enlightenment, and attain [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, how are they not apprehensible?” {Ki.VIII: 110}

65.27 “Śāradvatīputra,” replied the Blessed One, “there is no apprehending at all for bodhisattva great beings who practice the perfection of wisdom. If you ask why, it is because when those bodhisattva [F.285.a] great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not apprehend any beings at all, except in conventional terms by way of relative symbols. In this regard, Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings teach the Dharma to beings, having been established in the two truths—the relative truth and the ultimate truth—but, Śāradvatīputra, in the context of the two truths beings are not apprehended, nor are beings conceived. On the contrary, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom through skill in means, they teach the Dharma to beings through which those beings will have no apprehending of self in this very lifetime—not to mention something that they should attain or by which they should gain attainment. It is in this manner, Śāradvatīputra, that when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, through skill in means they teach the Dharma to beings.”

65.28 “Blessed Lord, bodhisattva great beings do not apprehend singularity or difference with respect to anything at all. They don such an armor, and by donning that armor, they are not perceptible in the realm of desire, nor are they perceptible in the realm of form, nor are they perceptible in the realm of formlessness. They are not perceptible, either in conditioned elements or in unconditioned elements. Endowed with great enthusiasm, they liberate beings from the three realms and yet they do not apprehend beings, nor do they apprehend any concept of beings. Since there is no concept of beings, beings are neither bound nor liberated. Since beings are neither bound nor liberated, they are neither afflicted nor [F.285.b] purified. Since they are neither afflicted nor purified, the minds of those on the path are not apprehended as different, and for the minds of those on the path that are not differentiated, there will be no karma or afflicted mental states. When there is no karma or afflicted mental states, from where could there possibly arise the maturation [of past actions] through which they themselves, or other beings, are perceptible, roaming within the five classes of living beings?”

65.29 “Śāradvatīputra, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “As you have said, if any being had appeared in the past but not in the future—or similarly, if any had existed in the past but not in the future—or if the tathāgatas and bodhisattvas had similarly passed away in that manner, [there would be a fault],⁵⁵³ but, on the contrary, Śāradvatīputra, whether the tathāgatas have appeared or whether the tathāgatas have not appeared, the real nature of phenomena, the unmistakable real nature, the one and only real nature, reality, the realm of phenomena, the abiding nature of phenomena, the maturity with respect to all phenomena, the very limit of reality, and the inconceivable realm dwell in this manner. Since in it there is no self, no being, no life form, no living being, {Ki.VIII: 111} no life, no living creature, no individual person, no human being, no person, no actor, no experiencer, no knower, and no viewer, how could physical forms possibly exist in it? How could feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, or consciousness possibly exist in it? How could the sense fields, the sensory elements, or the links of dependent origination possibly exist in it? [F.286.a] How could the attributes associated with the links of dependent origination possibly exist in it? If these attributes are nonexistent, from what cyclic existence with its five classes of living beings could beings be liberated? How could such phenomena possibly exist in it?

65.30 “In this regard, Śāradvatīputra, bodhisattva great beings, having heard from the lord buddhas of the past that such phenomena are empty of essential nature, set out for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, for the sake of beings. Apart from the fixation of ordinary persons, which is due to their erroneous views, they do not apprehend beings or anything at all. Śāradvatīputra, such is the mighty armor that bodhisattva great beings don. By donning that armor, they make irreversible progress toward unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and they think, ‘I should not fail to attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! Rather, I should absolutely attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment! Even after attaining consummate buddhahood, I should act in accordance with the Dharma for the sake of beings, and through those acts of benefit liberate beings from erroneous views!’

65.31 “Śāradvatīputra, this is just as if an illusionist or a phantom person were to conjure up many hundred billion trillions of living creatures and satisfy them with an abundance of delicious and pleasant food and delicacies, and, having satisfied them in that manner, were to purposefully say, ‘I have accrued much merit! I have accrued much merit!’ In that case, Śāradvatīputra, [F.286.b] do you think that anyone would be fed or satisfied? Would anyone have accrued merit?”

“No, Blessed Lord!”

65.32 “Similarly, Śāradvatīputra,” continued the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, indeed practice the perfections; practice all the aspects of emptiness; practice the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; practice the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways; practice the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, {Ki.VIII: 112} and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas; perfect the path of enlightenment; and refine the buddhafiels, they bring beings to maturation and yet they do not apprehend any being at all, such as they might apprehend and then discipline.” [B72]

65.33 Then the venerable Subhūti asked the Blessed One, “Blessed Lord, what path of enlightenment do bodhisattva great beings practice? What is the path of enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings who bring beings to maturation and refine the buddhafiels?” [F.287.a]

65.34 “In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “bodhisattva great beings, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, practice the perfection of generosity. They practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom. They practice the emptiness of internal phenomena. They practice the emptiness of external phenomena. They practice the emptiness of external and internal phenomena. They practice [the other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity. They practice the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They practice the four truths of the noble ones, the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, the four formless absorptions, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the five extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways. They practice the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. They bring beings to maturation, and they also refine the buddhafiels.”

65.35 “Blessed Lord, how do bodhisattva great beings bring beings to maturation, while practicing the perfection of generosity?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” [F.287.b] replied the Blessed One, “when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they dispense generosity to beings, and having given them gifts, they instruct and advise them as follows: ‘Noble children, do not acquisitively grasp this gift! By acquisitively grasping this gift and then [in the next life] assuming a physical body, you will experience many sufferings. Such is the physical body you will assume! Noble children, here in ultimate reality there is no generosity, nor is there a fruit of generosity, nor is there a donor of generosity, nor is there a recipient of generosity. All these phenomena are empty of inherent existence. Something that is empty of inherent existence cannot be received. Emptiness of inherent existence cannot be grasped.’

65.36 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity, they dispense generosity to beings, but do not apprehend generosity. They do not apprehend the donor of generosity and they do not apprehend the recipient. This is a perfection that is nonapprehensible. {Ki.VIII: 113} Such is the perfection of generosity. By not apprehending any of these three attributes—[gift, donor, or recipient]—they engage beings in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. They engage them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship. They engage them in individual enlightenment, and they engage them in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

65.37 “Subhūti, when bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of generosity in that manner, they bring beings to maturation. They themselves dispense generosity and they also encourage others to [practice] generosity. They praise generosity, and they also praise and take empathetic delight in other beings who dispense generosity. [F.288.a] So it is that when they dispense such great gifts of generosity, these bodhisattva great beings will be born equal in fortune to the great and lofty royal families. They will be born equal in fortune to the great and lofty priestly families. They will be born equal in fortune to the great and lofty householder families. They will become a regional king, or they will acquire the rank of a universal emperor.

65.38 “In these states, they will also attract beings through the four attractive qualities. If you ask what these four are, they comprise generosity, pleasant speech, purposeful activity, and harmony. Then gradually they will also establish beings who are attracted by such acts of generosity in ethical discipline, and they will establish them in tolerance, perseverance, meditative stability, and wisdom. They will establish them in the four meditative concentrations, the four immeasurable attitudes, and the four formless absorptions. They will establish them in the four applications of mindfulness, the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path. They will establish them in the four truths of the noble ones, the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the gateways of liberation—emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness—the five extrasensory powers, all the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways. They will cause them to enter into the maturity [of the bodhisattvas], and cause them to attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship. [F.288.b] They will cause them to attain individual enlightenment, and encourage them to [attain] unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, saying, 'O you people! As for unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, it is not difficult to attain consummate buddhahood. With the exception of the misunderstanding of deluded beings due to erroneous views, there is nothing at all to which beings are attached that exists according to the essential nature. Therefore, you should sever the continuity of all erroneous grasping and release yourselves from cyclic existence, and you should also release others! In that manner you yourself should undertake acts of great benefit, and you should also engage others in acts of great benefit!'

65.39 "Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of generosity in that manner. When they practice in that manner, commencing from the time when they first begin to set their mind on enlightenment, they will never by any means fall into the lower realms, and they will never fail to become a universal emperor and act accordingly. If you ask why, just as a seed produces fruit, however many petitioners approach that universal emperor, the universal emperor will think, 'I have assumed the fruitional state of a universal emperor for the sake of nothing but the welfare of beings.' [Ki.VIII: 114] And he will then say, 'Whatever you want will be given to you! This is yours, not mine! I have no interest in my inner body, let alone in anything outside! I have assumed [a rebirth within] cyclic existence for nothing but the welfare of beings. Indeed, I have no interest in cyclic existence for my own sake.' Having perfected great compassion imbued with love, they act for the benefit of beings through great compassion, [F.289.a] but do not apprehend such beings as consummately real, instead engaging with them as notions, names, and conventional expressions. They know that even this act of engagement is devoid of engagement, like an echo.

65.40 "Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings should practice the perfection of generosity in that manner. When they do so, there is nothing at all that they should not sacrifice for the sake of beings, even so far as their own flesh, not to even mention the external resources with which they liberate beings from cyclic existence! They should practice in that manner."

65.41 "What are those resources?"

The Blessed One replied, "The perfection of generosity is a resource. The perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom are resources. The emptiness of internal phenomena is a resource. The emptiness of external phenomena is a resource. The emptiness of external and internal phenomena is a resource. [The other aspects of emptiness], up to and including the emptiness of the essential nature of nonentity, are resources. The applications of mindfulness, the correct exertions, the supports for miraculous ability, the faculties, the powers, the branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path are resources. The truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways are resources. The powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, [F.289.b] great loving kindness, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas are resources. These are all resources. Through these resources they attract beings and gradually bring them to attain final nirvāṇa by means of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, the Great Vehicle, or all three vehicles. Subhūti, it is in this manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, attract beings through the perfection of generosity.

65.42 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the perfection of ethical discipline, while practicing the perfection of generosity, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, settled in the perfection of generosity, dispense generosity to beings, and when they dispense generosity, they would say, ‘Come here, noble children! You should keep [the vows of] ethical discipline! I will ensure that you are not deprived of food, drink, clothing, bedding, flowers, incense, perfume, garlands, unguents, houses, wealth, grain, gemstones, pearls, beryl, conch, crystal, coral, gold, silver, and the facility of human resources, up to and including any resource whatsoever. Since it seems that you engaged in immorality due to deprivation, I will ensure that you are not deprived of any resources and [necessities], up to and including the seven precious materials. Consequently, having received the vows of ethical discipline, you should gradually put an end to suffering by means of the vehicle of the śrāvakas, the vehicle of the pratyekabuddhas, the vehicle of all-aspect omniscience, or all three vehicles.’ [F.290.a]

65.43 “Those bodhisattva great beings should themselves keep [the vows of] ethical discipline, and they should also encourage others to [keep the vows of] ethical discipline. They also speak in praise of ethical discipline, and they praise and delight in empathy with other beings who keep [the vows of] ethical discipline. In that manner, bodhisattva great beings engage those beings in ethical discipline and establish them in ethical discipline. Gradually they bring them to attain final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles. Subhūti, it is in that manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, attract beings through the perfection of ethical discipline. {Ki.VIII: 115}

65.44 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the perfection of tolerance, while practicing the perfection of generosity, in this regard, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings, settled in the perfection of generosity, see any beings who are angered or malicious, they would say to them, ‘Noble children, for what reason do you indulge in malice? If being deprived of anything causes you to indulge in malice, you should take it from me! I will ensure that you are not deprived of food, drink, or any other resources whatsoever, up to and including any of the things that human beings require. You should do away with anger and malice!’ It is in that manner that bodhisattva great beings maintain the perfection of generosity. They should engage beings in tolerance, saying, ‘The enmity through which your anger arises is pointless. In it there is no entity at all. This anger is a false imagination. [F.290.b] There is no inherent existence of entities at all, and this applies to any entity that might cause you to quarrel and indulge in enmity and malice, or that, having caused you to quarrel and indulge in enmity and malice, might then provoke you into fighting with clubs, piercing with weapons, or robbing one another of life. Since that is the case, if you are disturbed by false imaginations, you will fall into the hells, you will fall into the animal realm, and into the world of Yama, and in other lower realms apart from those you will also experience intolerable sufferings and unpleasant sensations of heat and harshness. As a result of having acquired karma for the sake of something that is a nonentity, you people will fail to obtain even a human birth, not to mention [the prospect] of you encountering a buddha who has appeared! Do not acquire such karma! Friends, the appearance of a buddha is rare. The obtaining of a human birth is rare. The excellence of freedom [to practice the Dharma] is rare. Release from cyclic existence is rare. Since that is the case, do not render this freedom meaningless! Do not resort to unfavorable states [with no freedom to practice the Dharma], and do not resort to unrectifiable states!’

65.45 “In this regard, bodhisattva great beings should themselves practice tolerance and they should also encourage others to [practice] tolerance. They also speak in praise of tolerance, and they praise and delight in empathy with other beings cultivating tolerance. In that manner bodhisattva great beings engage beings in tolerance and establish them in tolerance. Gradually they bring them to attain final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles. {Ki.VIII: 116} Subhūti, it is in that manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, [F.291.a] attract beings through the perfection of tolerance.

65.46 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the perfection of perseverance, while practicing the perfection of generosity, in this regard, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings see beings who are indolent and weak in perseverance, they would say, ‘Why do you act indolently?’ If they reply that it is because they lack fortunate conditions, in that case, bodhisattva great beings practicing the perfection of generosity should say to those beings, ‘O people, I will provide you with the favorable condition of generosity, the favorable condition of ethical discipline, the favorable condition of tolerance, or anything else that will enable you to undertake perseverance. Undertake perseverance!’ Consequently, these beings enjoy the resources of those bodhisattva great beings and they undertake acts of physical and mental perseverance. Through physical and mental perseverance they perfect all virtuous attributes and through these virtuous attributes they cultivate attributes that are without contamination. By having cultivated these, they will attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship. They will attain individual enlightenment, and they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.

65.47 “In this regard, bodhisattva great beings should themselves undertake acts of perseverance and they should also encourage others to [undertake] acts of perseverance. They also speak in praise of perseverance, and [F.291.b] they praise and delight in empathy with other beings who undertake acts of perseverance. In that manner bodhisattva great beings engage beings in perseverance and establish them in perseverance. Gradually they bring them to attain final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles. Subhūti, it is in that manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, attract beings through the perfection of perseverance.

65.48 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the perfection of meditative concentration, while practicing the perfection of generosity, in this regard, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings see beings who are distracted, they would say, ‘Why are you beings not absorbed in meditative concentration?’ And if they were to reply that it is because they lack fortunate conditions, in that case, bodhisattva great beings practicing the perfection of generosity should advise those beings, ‘O beings, I will provide you with favorable conditions according to your needs through which you will be without conceptual thoughts concerning external and internal phenomena.’ Consequently, these bodhisattva great beings will provide those beings with favorable conditions according to their needs, through which they will be without conceptual thoughts. So it is that those beings will sever their conceptual thoughts and become absorbed in the first meditative concentration. They will become absorbed in the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration. They will become absorbed in loving kindness. They will become absorbed in compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity. [F.292.a] They will become absorbed in the sphere of infinite space, and they will become absorbed in the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception. By having tamed their minds through absorption in these meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, and formless absorptions, they will then cultivate the four applications of mindfulness. They will cultivate the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path, and they will cultivate the three gateways to liberation. {Ki.VIII: 117} By having cultivated these [attributes] they will gradually attain final nirvāṇa by means of the three vehicles, and some of them will not degenerate from the path of enlightenment until they have attained unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, it is in this manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, attract beings through the perfection of meditative stability.

65.49 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the perfection of wisdom, while practicing the perfection of generosity, in this regard, Subhūti, if bodhisattva great beings maintaining the perfection of generosity see beings who have resorted to stupidity, they would say, ‘Why do you beings not cultivate wisdom?’ And if they were to reply that it is because they lack fortunate conditions, in that case, bodhisattva great beings practicing the perfection of generosity should advise and instruct those beings, saying, ‘Take resources from me! Give gifts! Keep [the vows of] ethical discipline! Cultivate tolerance! Undertake acts of perseverance! Be absorbed in meditative stability! [F.292.b] When you perfect these aspects and cultivate the perfection of wisdom, you should examine whether there is anything at all that exists, whether selves, sentient beings, life forms, living beings, lives, living creatures, individual persons, human beings, people, actors, experiencers, knowers, viewers, physical forms, feelings, perceptions, formative predispositions, consciousness, sense fields, sensory elements, links of dependent origination, perfections, any aspects of emptiness, factors conducive to enlightenment, truths of the noble ones, meditative concentrations, immeasurable attitudes, formless absorptions, aspects of liberation, serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, extrasensory powers, meditative stabilities, dhāraṇī gateways, powers of the tathāgatas, fearlessnesses, kinds of exact knowledge, great compassion, distinct qualities of the buddhas, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience.’

65.50 “Consequently, when these bodhisattva great beings practice the perfection of wisdom, they do not apprehend anything. They do not apprehend any such thing on which they would be fixated, and since they are without fixation, they do not observe anything at all that arises or ceases, or that is defiled or purified. [F.293.a] Since they do not observe anything, they do not think, ‘This is a being in the hells. This is one born in the animal realm. This is one belonging to the world of Yama. This is one included within the class of asuras. This is a god. This is a human being. This is one who keeps [the vows of] ethical discipline. This is an immoral being. This is one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa. This is one destined for only one more rebirth. This is one no longer subject to rebirth. This is an arhat. This is a pratyekabuddha. This is a bodhisattva. This is a tathāgata, arhat, completely awakened buddha.’

65.51 “Subhūti, it is in this manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, attract beings through the perfection of wisdom. {Ki.VIII:118}

65.52 “Subhūti, if you ask how bodhisattva great beings engage beings in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, while maintaining the perfection of generosity, the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative stability, and the perfection of wisdom, in this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings provide resources to beings, and the beings who are favored with these resources cultivate the factors conducive to enlightenment. By cultivating these factors conducive to enlightenment, they will be released from cyclic existence. Subhūti, it is in that manner that bodhisattva great beings, while maintaining the six perfections, engage beings in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment.

65.53 “Moreover, Subhūti, [F.293.b] if bodhisattva great beings practicing the perfection of generosity see beings who are unprotected, imbued with suffering, and deprived of food and clothing, they bring them to maturation, advising and instructing them with the following words: ‘Come here, noble children! Take from me food, drink, transport, bedding, flowers, incense, perfume, garlands, unguents, the facilities of human beings, or any resources whatsoever, up to and including the seven precious materials! Let them be of help to beings!’⁵⁵⁴ [May that bring about your welfare, benefit, and happiness for a long period of time! Do not think this benefit is theirs but not mine. You yourself have achieved this benefit for the sake of beings for a long time. You should think, “That which is mine is yours,” and dispense it for the sake of beings. Through that act of generosity, too, you should engage them in ethical discipline, and you should engage them in tolerance, perseverance, meditative concentration, and wisdom. You should engage them in all the aspects of emptiness and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. You should engage them in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. You should engage them in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. Do not be contented with that alone. You should establish them higher still in uncontaminated attributes. That is to say, you should establish them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and you should establish them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, and unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.’

65.54 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings maintaining the perfection of generosity in that manner bring beings to maturation, they release those who have been brought to maturation in that manner from the three lower realms, and then release them from the entirety of cyclic existence.

65.55 “Moreover, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings maintaining the perfection of ethical discipline should bring beings to maturation in the following manner: {Ki.VIII: 119} ‘You have engaged in immoral acts because you are lacking in favorable conditions. I will bestow these favorable conditions upon you. Take food, drink, clothing, transport, bedding, flowers, incense, perfume, garlands, unguents, the facilities of human beings, and any resource whatsoever, including the seven precious materials! Let these be of benefit to beings!’⁵⁵⁵

65.56 “Maintaining the perfection of ethical discipline, they help beings through such acts of benefit, and when they have helped them through such acts of benefit, those beings come to adopt and maintain the ten virtuous actions. That is to say, they maintain the vows of ethical discipline, which are untainted, unadulterated, unblemished, nondegenerate, independent, praised by the wise, and absolutely perfect—the causal basis of meditative stability. They maintain the six perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They maintain the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways.

They maintain the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. And they are induced subsequently to attain all-aspect omniscience.

65.57 “Moreover, Subhūti, [F.294.a] while maintaining the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, if bodhisattva great beings see beings who are narrow-minded and resorting to stupidity, they should bring them to maturation in the following manner: ‘You have resorted to stupidity because you are lacking in any favorable conditions. I will bestow these favorable conditions upon you. Take food, drink, clothing, transport, bedding, flowers, incense, perfume, garlands, unguents, the facilities of human beings, and any resource whatsoever, including the seven precious materials!’

65.58 “Maintaining the perfection of wisdom [and so forth], they help beings through such acts of benefit, and having helped them through such acts of benefit, these beings who are undeluded and wise maintain the perfection of wisdom. They maintain the six perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, and the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment. They maintain the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways. They maintain the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas. And they are induced subsequently to attain all-aspect omniscience.

65.59 “Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings who maintain the perfection of wisdom [F.294.b] in that manner bring beings to maturation, they release those who have been brought to maturation in that manner from the three lower realms, and then release them from the entirety of cyclic existence.”

65.60 This completes the sixty-fifth chapter from “The Perfection of Wisdom in Twenty-Five Thousand Lines.”

66.1 Then the venerable Subhūti thought, “When bodhisattva great beings thus don such armor, what is the path to enlightenment of bodhisattva great beings?”

66.2 Then the Blessed One, comprehending the thoughts in the mind of the venerable Subhūti, addressed him as follows: “Subhūti, the six perfections constitute the path of bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, all the aspects of emptiness constitute the path of bodhisattva great beings. The thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment constitute the path of bodhisattva great beings. Subhūti, the four truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and all the dhāraṇī gateways constitute the path of bodhisattva great beings. The ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas constitute the path of bodhisattva great beings. Furthermore, Subhūti, all phenomena constitute the path of bodhisattva great beings. [F.295.a]

66.3 “Subhūti, do you think that there is anything in which bodhisattva great beings should not train, and is there anything even without training in which they will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment? Subhūti, there is nothing at all in which bodhisattva great beings should not train. Without having trained in all phenomena, bodhisattva great beings cannot attain all-aspect omniscience.”

66.4 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are empty, in what manner should bodhisattva great beings train? Blessed Lord, would they conceptually elaborate that which is without conceptual elaboration when they say, ‘There are so many of these but [not] of those,’⁵⁵⁶ or ‘These are mundane attributes. These are supramundane attributes. These are contaminated attributes. These are uncontaminated attributes. {Ki.VIII: 120}

These are conditioned attributes. These are unconditioned attributes. These are the attributes of ordinary people. These are the attributes of one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa. These are the attributes of one destined for only one more rebirth, one no longer subject to rebirth, or an arhat. These are the attributes of pratyekabuddhas. These are the attributes of bodhisattvas.
These are the attributes of the buddhas’?”

66.5 “Subhūti, it is so! It is so,” replied the Blessed One. “All phenomena are empty. Subhūti, if all phenomena were not empty of inherent existence, bodhisattva great beings, even after training in all phenomena, [F.295.b] would not attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Subhūti, you also said that if all phenomena are empty of inherent existence, would bodhisattva great beings differentiate phenomena, saying, ‘There are so many of these but [not] of those,’ or ‘These are mundane attributes. These are supramundane attributes. These are contaminated attributes. These are uncontaminated attributes. These are conditioned attributes. These are unconditioned attributes. These are the attributes of ordinary people. These are the attributes of one who has entered the stream to nirvāṇa. These are the attributes of one destined for only one more rebirth, one no longer subject to rebirth, or an arhat. These are the attributes of pratyekabuddhas. These are the attributes of bodhisattvas.
These are the attributes of the buddhas’? As far as that is concerned, Subhūti, do beings know that all phenomena are empty? If they did know that, even bodhisattva great beings would not train in all phenomena and then attain all-aspect omniscience. However, Subhūti, it is because these beings do not know that all phenomena are empty that bodhisattva great beings do attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, and then establish the Dharma and teach the Dharma to beings.

66.6 “In this regard, Subhūti, bodhisattva great beings, [F.296.a] when they practice the bodhisattva path, should at the outset make the following observation: ‘Herein there is nothing at all apart from conditioning that can be apprehended in terms of the essential nature.’ Since they realize the essential nature of all phenomena in that manner, they do not become fixated on anything at all—whether it be the perfections, all the aspects of emptiness, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, the dhāraṇī gateways, the powers of the tathāgatas, the fearlessnesses, the kinds of exact knowledge, great compassion, the distinct qualities of the buddhas, the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, individual enlightenment, or [the goals], up to and including unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are empty of essential nature, and emptiness does not become fixated on emptiness. Since they do not apprehend even emptiness, how could they possibly be fixated on emptiness! {Ki.VIII: 121} So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings engage with all phenomena, but are without fixation with respect to all phenomena.

66.7 “Maintaining this training, they examine the conduct of all beings. [F.296.b] Wondering what these beings are practicing, they think, ‘Alas! These beings are engaged in grasping at that which does not exist! Alas! It makes it difficult⁵⁵⁷ if these beings are to be freed from grasping at that which does not exist.’

66.8 “At that time, while maintaining the perfections, through skill in means they instruct them as follows: ‘Come here, beings! Dispense generosity and you will have resources! Do not give rise to conceits on account of these resources! They lack even the slightest essence!’ Similarly, they should instruct them in ethical discipline, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Keep [the vows of] ethical discipline, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that ethical discipline. It lacks even the slightest essence!’ Similarly, they should instruct them in tolerance, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate tolerance, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that tolerance. It lacks even the slightest essence!’ Similarly, they should instruct them in perseverance, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Undertake acts of perseverance, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that perseverance. It lacks even the slightest essence!’ Similarly, they should instruct them in meditative stability, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Be absorbed in meditative stability, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that meditative stability. It lacks even the slightest essence!’ Similarly, they should instruct them in wisdom, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate wisdom, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that wisdom. It lacks even the slightest essence!’

66.9 “Similarly, they should instruct them in all the aspects of emptiness, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate emptiness, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that emptiness. It lacks even the slightest essence!’ Similarly, they should instruct them in the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, saying, ‘Come here, beings! [F.297.a] Cultivate the factors conducive to enlightenment, and do not give rise to conceits on account of those factors conducive to enlightenment. They lack even the slightest essence!’

- 66.10 “Similarly, they should instruct them in the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate the dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits on account of those dhāraṇī gateways [and so forth]. They lack even the slightest essence!’
- 66.11 “Similarly, they should instruct them in the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great compassion, and the distinct qualities of the buddhas, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate the distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits on account of those distinct qualities of the buddhas [and so forth]. They lack even the slightest essence!’
- 66.12 “Similarly, they should instruct them in the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, and do not give rise to conceits on account of that fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa. It lacks lack even the slightest essence!’
- 66.13 “Similarly, they should instruct them in the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, arhatship, and individual enlightenment, saying, ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate individual enlightenment [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits on account of that individual enlightenment [and so forth]. They lack even the slightest essence!’
- 66.14 “Similarly, they should instruct them in [the goals], up to and including all-aspect omniscience, saying, [F.297.b] ‘Come here, beings! Cultivate all-aspect omniscience [and so forth], and do not give rise to conceits on account of that all-aspect omniscience [and so forth]. They lack even the slightest essence!’
- 66.15 “Instructing and advising beings accordingly, they continue to practice the path of the bodhisattvas but do not become fixated on anything at all. If you ask why, it is because all phenomena are without fixation. Owing to the essential nature of emptiness, they have no essential nature by which bodhisattvas would become fixated.
- 66.16 “So it is, Subhūti, that bodhisattva great beings practice the path of enlightenment, but do not dwell in anything at all. In a nondwelling manner, they practice the perfection of generosity but do not dwell in it, and they practice the perfection of ethical discipline, the perfection of tolerance, the perfection of perseverance, the perfection of meditative concentration, and the perfection of wisdom, but do not dwell in them.

66.17 “They become absorbed in the first meditative concentration, but they do not dwell in it. If you ask why, it is because the first meditative concentration is empty of the inherent existence of meditative concentration, while those who become absorbed in it are also empty of inherent existence, and the aspects [of it] through which they become absorbed are also empty of inherent existence. {Ki.VIII: 122} They become absorbed in the second meditative concentration, the third meditative concentration, and the fourth meditative concentration; they become absorbed in loving kindness, compassion, empathetic joy, and equanimity; they become absorbed in the sphere of infinite space, the sphere of infinite consciousness, the sphere of nothing-at-all, and the sphere of neither perception nor nonperception; [F.298.a] and they become absorbed in the eight aspects of liberation, the nine serial steps of meditative absorption, the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment, the truths of the noble ones, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, and the extrasensory powers, but they do not dwell in them. If you ask why, it is because the extrasensory powers [and so forth] are empty of the inherent existence of the extrasensory powers [and so forth], while those who become absorbed in them are also empty of inherent existence, and the aspects [of them] through which they become absorbed are also empty of inherent existence.

66.18 “They attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa, but they do not dwell in it. They attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, and arhatship, but they do not dwell in them. Similarly, they attain individual enlightenment, but they do not dwell in it.”

66.19 “Why do they not dwell in them?”

“They do not dwell in them for two reasons,” replied the Blessed One. “What are those two, you may ask? They are the essential nature and the absence of essential nature. Owing to these two, the fruits are nonexistent, be they [fruits] in which one might dwell, by which one might dwell, or which themselves dwell. Just because of that they are not satisfied by them. If you ask why, it is because they think, ‘I should not attain the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa! I should not dwell in it. I should not attain the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth, the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth, or arhatship. I should not dwell in them. I should not attain [the levels], up to and including the level of the pratyekabuddhas. I should not dwell in them. I should attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, [F.298.b] commencing from the time when I first begin to set my mind on enlightenment, I will not develop any thoughts whatsoever, apart from setting the mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. If you ask why, commencing from the first [bodhisattva] level, up to the tenth [bodhisattva] level, I will not develop any thoughts whatsoever, apart from setting the mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Commencing from [the other levels], up to and including the tenth level, I will not develop any thoughts whatsoever, apart from setting the mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment. Having entered upon the maturity of the bodhisattvas, I will not develop any thoughts whatsoever, apart from setting the mind on unsurpassed, complete enlightenment.'

66.20 "Subhūti, whatever the actions in which bodhisattva great beings undistractedly engage with body, {Ki.VIII: 123} speech, and mind, they do not cease to engage with the mind set on enlightenment. Abiding in the mind set on enlightenment, those bodhisattva great beings achieve the path of enlightenment without distraction."

66.21 "Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are nonarising, how will bodhisattva great beings achieve the path of enlightenment?"

"Subhūti, it is so! It is so," replied the Blessed One. "All phenomena are nonarising. If you ask how that is so, all phenomena are nonarising for those who do not effect conditioning."

66.22 "On the other hand, Blessed Lord, is it not the case that, whether the tathāgatas have appeared or whether the tathāgatas have not appeared, the reality of phenomena dwells in that manner?"

"Subhūti, it is so! It is so," replied the Blessed One. [F.299.a] "Whether the tathāgatas have appeared or whether the tathāgatas have not appeared, the abiding nature of phenomena dwells in that manner. And yet, for the sake of those who do not know this abiding nature of phenomena, bodhisattva great beings develop the path of enlightenment. Through that path they liberate beings from cyclic existence."

66.23 "Blessed Lord, is enlightenment then attained by a path that arises?"

"No!" replied the Blessed One.

66.24 "Well then, Blessed Lord, is enlightenment attained by a path that does not arise?"

"No!" replied the Blessed One.

66.25 "Well then, Blessed Lord, is enlightenment attained by a path that both arises and does not arise?"

"No!" replied the Blessed One.

66.26 "Well then, Blessed Lord, is enlightenment attained by a path that neither arises nor does not arise?"

"No!" replied the Blessed One.

66.27 "Well then, Blessed Lord, how is enlightenment attained?"

“Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “enlightenment will not be attained by means of the path, nor will it be attained by means of that which is not the path. Enlightenment itself is the path and the path itself is enlightenment.” {Ki.VIII:124}

66.28 “Blessed Lord, if enlightenment itself is the path and the path itself is enlightenment, then bodhisattva great beings will have already attained enlightenment, so why then is it taught that the tathāgatas, arhats, completely awakened buddhas are described in accordance with the thirty-two major marks of a great person, [F.299.b] the eighty excellent minor marks, the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas?”

66.29 “Subhūti, do you think that the buddhas attain enlightenment?” asked the Blessed One.

“No, Blessed Lord! The buddhas do not attain enlightenment. The buddhas are themselves enlightenment, and enlightenment is itself the buddhas.”

66.30 “Subhūti,” continued the Blessed One, “you just said bodhisattva great beings will have already attained enlightenment. In this regard, Subhūti, after perfecting the perfections; after perfecting all the aspects of emptiness; after perfecting the thirty-seven factors conducive to enlightenment; after perfecting the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, wishlessness, the extrasensory powers, the meditative stabilities, and the dhāraṇī gateways; and after perfecting the ten powers of the tathāgatas, the four fearlessnesses, the four kinds of exact knowledge, great loving kindness, great compassion, and the eighteen distinct qualities of the buddhas, bodhisattva great beings will attain consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, through the unique instant of wisdom that is the vajra-like meditative stability.⁵⁵⁸ And in the period after they have attained consummate buddhahood in unsurpassed, complete enlightenment, [F.300.a] those bodhisattvas are said to be omniscient tathāgatas who have mastered all phenomena.”

66.31 Subhūti then asked, “Blessed Lord, if all phenomena are devoid of inherent existence, how do bodhisattva great beings refine the buddhafiels?”

“In this regard, Subhūti,” replied the Blessed One, “commencing from their setting of the mind on enlightenment, bodhisattva great beings purify themselves and others of the factors of body, speech, and mind that take on negative states. {Ki.VIII: 125} Through those acts of purification they refine the buddhafiels.” [B73]

66.32 “Blessed Lord, what are the factors of the body that take on negative states, the factors of speech that take on negative states, and the factors of mind that take on negative states?”

The Blessed One replied, “Physical nonvirtuous actions—the killing of living creatures, the stealing of what is not given, and sexual misconduct due to desire—constitute factors of the body that take on negative states for a bodhisattva. Verbal nonvirtuous actions—the telling of lies, slander, verbal abuse, and irresponsible chatter—constitute factors of speech that take on negative states for a bodhisattva. Mental nonvirtuous actions—covetousness, malice, and wrong views—constitute factors of mind that take on negative states for a bodhisattva.

66.33 “Moreover, Subhūti, thoughts of miserliness are factors of mind that take on negative states for a bodhisattva. Thoughts of degenerate morality, thoughts of agitation, [F.300.b] thoughts of indolence, thoughts of distraction, thoughts of noncomposure, and thoughts of stupidity are factors of mind that take on negative states for a bodhisattva.

66.34 “Moreover, Subhūti, impure ethical discipline is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The lack of the four applications of mindfulness is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The lack of the four correct exertions, the four supports for miraculous ability, the five faculties, the five powers, the seven branches of enlightenment, and the noble eightfold path is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The lack of the truths of the noble ones, the meditative concentrations, the immeasurable attitudes, the formless absorptions, the aspects of liberation, the serial steps of meditative absorption, emptiness, signlessness, and wishlessness is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva.

66.35 “Moreover, Subhūti, the actualizing of or longing for the fruit of entering the stream to nirvāṇa is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The actualizing of or longing for the fruit of being destined for only one more rebirth is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The actualizing of or longing for the fruit of no longer being subject to rebirth is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The actualizing of or longing for arhatship is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. The actualizing of or longing for individual enlightenment is a factor that takes on negative states for a bodhisattva. {Ki.VIII: 126}
